Mr. Willis has gained a wide and deservedly high reputation as the builder of many Cathedral organs. The following is, we believe, a complete list:

St. Paul's (London).

Aberdeen.	Exeter.	St. David's.
Canterbury.	Glasgow.	Salisbury.
Carlisle.	Hereford.	Truro
Durham.	Lincoln.	Wells.
Edinburgh.	Oxford.	Winchester.

In addition to the other important instruments already referred to, he has built two large organs for the Alexandra Palace, the nucleus of the former of which (burnt June 9, 1873) was in the Exhibition of 1862. He also erected the organ in Windsor Castle, which has two keyboards, one in St. George's Hall and the other in Her Majesty's Private Chapel, whereby the instrument is available for use in both places.

Perhaps the most notable "Willis organ" in the various Nonconformist denominations is that in Union Chapel, Islington, an instrument upon which Guilmant has often played. It is remarkable for its position. In order to save the blocking up of a rose window, the instrument is built in a concrete chamber below the main floor of the building. This position is Mr. Willis's own idea, which he carried out in spite of the evil prognostications of those who considered that he was doing a foolish thing. One great advantage has resulted therefrom. Throughout an oratorio performance, when the building is crowded with people, and the temperature rises very high, the organ is found to be "dead in tune."

Mr. Willis as a "Skipper."

Mr. Willis's great hobby is yachting. He attributes the wonderful health he enjoys to the sea voyages in his yacht. "I have circumnavigated the whole of England and Scotland," he says, "and I am my own captain. Those two men over there (pointing to two of his employés working in the factory) are my steward and shipwright. The steward is a fisherman—a fisherman being very useful as a weather-prophet." Mr. Willis's yacht is named the "Opal" (54 tons), and she lies in Tilbury Dock. "I do all the repairs for her myself," he adds. "I have myself re-coppered her bottom two or three times. I also put entirely new spars into her, and there stands her old mast. Some years ago I injured the third and fourth fingers of both my hands with the ropes passing through them. These four fingers became bent under, and for a long time I had to play my services with only the thumb and two fingers of each hand. But Dr. Macready, a very clever surgeon, begged me to allow him to operate on my disabled fingers, with the result that I can now use them as of old, or nearly so."

Some Characteristics.

"Mr. Willis has a very strong aversion to the newspaper man," we were credibly informed by one of his trusty workmen; "and I have seen several of them sent about their business without any ceremony." But nothing could be more cordial and pleasant than the manner in which Mr. Willis entered into our proposal to record some of the incidents of his long and eventful career; and we sincerely acknowledge the kindness with which he unreservedly placed himself, so to speak, at our disposal. One has only to be in his presence a very short time in order to realise that he is a man possessing a strong personality. Clever, ingenious, dauntless, and resourceful—qualities blended together with a plentiful supply of sound judgment and good common sense—are some of the striking characteristics of this remarkable man. He has all the enthusiasm of youth, being so energetic in his movements that it is difficult to realise he will have entered upon his seventy-eighth year by the time these pages are in the reader's hands. Such an expression of his, on greeting an early morning visitor, as "I've been running about the place like a lamplighter," exactly describes the rapidity with which, to use an Americanism, he "careers around" his factory. The amount of nerve force centred in that somewhat diminutive frame is really quite extraordinary.

Although tenaciously holding a strong belief in his own powers, Mr. Willis is entirely free from a merely conceited opinion of himself. As we have already pointed out, he is not always amenable to dictation. This is especially the case when he comes face to face with architects. Such interviews are by no means unattended with difficulties; and we are not altogether surprised to hear the following from the lips of Mr. Willis's foreman: "I have seen some rare old pantomimes here between the guv'nor and architects; but the architects always come off second best."

In making a tour of the factory with Mr. Willis as a guide, it is interesting to hear of the cordial relations which exist between employer and employed. The majority of his workmen have been with him for many years. "That man working over there is a capital fellow. I give him good wages, but he turns out a lot of first-class work." Mr. Willis gives his personal attention to every department of his factory. Nothing is too insignificant to claim his notice. His thoroughness is extraordinary. Every pipe goes through his hands. An organist himself, he is always thinking of the player in laying out his instruments. He has a remarkable inventive genius, which he turns to good account in the mechanical portions of his organs. He takes infinite pains in everything, and his enthusiasm knows no bounds. But, above all, Mr. Willis possesses in a striking degree that attribute which a similar successful worker once aptly described as "obstinate perseverance," which when persistently applied in the pursuit of any calling is sure ultimately to command success.

"FATHER" WILLIS.

Two hundred years ago there lived in this country a great organ builder whose instruments were the glory of their maker. Two of his nephews were associated with him in his business. Partly in order to distinguish him from his younger relatives, but more especially as a mark of high appreciation of his great abilities and artistic worth, he was canonized, so to speak, with the title "Father." His name is familiar enough in the history of organ building—Father Smith. Henry Willis is also assisted by a younger generation, having two sons—Vincent and Henry—working with him, in whom he has great confidence and hopes. It is natural, therefore, that he, the greatest organ builder of the Victorian Era, will be called FATHER WILLIS.

SOME PRESENT ASPECTS OF MUSIC.

III.

MUSIC, in relation to criticism, has an aspect which, it may confidently be declared, is variously regarded, according to the side favoured by the observer in the never-ceasing war between critics and criticised. We may take it, however, that those who believe in the criticism of our own day as a power for good are much the weaker body numerically, if not in strength of judgment and clearness of vision. This is not an exceptional state of things. Indeed, it is so common that we may look upon it as perfectly natural—as a result the cause of which lies beyond our reach. The Irish immigrant in America who, when asked as to his politics, replied that he did not know Democrat from Republican, but anyhow was "agin' the Government," spoke as a typical personage. In all conditions and circumstances of life we lean towards jealousy and dislike of those in whom power is vested. In politics, this is strikingly shown, on the largest possible scale. Power has become a shuttlecock, which flies from side to side and stays no long time with either. No sooner does a general election turn Outs into Ins than a process of disintegration commences. The new Government is assailed on all sides, even by men in the ranks of its sworn supporters, and the next election turns Ins back again into Outs. So does the pendulum swing; with such amazing regularity that we are driven to explain it by reference to a natural law. In the domain of criticism the same principle is at work, albeit circumstances and manifestations are different. It is, of course, easy to understand that those who have been criticised, or are liable to undergo the operation, cherish no great love for, or confidence in, the operators. So far, that is a chronic condition, which will never be removed while human nature remains what it is. More remarkable appears to be the fact that others, who are outside the range of criticism, and not personally concerned, feel in sympathy with the criticised. A British jury, for example, more readily gives a verdict against a critic than for him, and the "damages" are in proportion. These matters come under common observation, and are such as critics can scarcely be congratulated upon. However honest and able any one of their number may be, he is hampered in his work for good by the impediments which dislike and mistrust throw in his path. An invincible spirit of opposition bars his way to the proverbial "fair field." The result is not only a limitation of his influence, at which the enemy naturally rejoices, but also the circumscribing of such healthy consequences as may conceivably flow from his taste and judgment. The public attitude here indicated should be taken into account in any estimate of the value of criticism, and set down as a cause beyond its control.

Some considerations, not without influence upon the power of criticism, should here be considered. In the first place, there is a disposition to go behind the written opinion, and judge it, not for itself, as should fairly be done, but with reference to the circumstances and personality of the writer. As regards musical criticism, the veil of anonymity, theoretically considered as transforming the concrete writer into an abstraction for which his editor is legally responsible, serves no such purpose. In most cases the critic is well known, and matters of pure personality are thus available as pièces de conviction when any of his utterances are brought to trial. The operation somewhat resembles that of a cross-examining counsel who, dealing with a piece of expert evidence, asks the witness if he is prepared to swear that, fifteen years ago, he did not turn his mother-in-law out of his house. A taunt frequently employed in the Old Bailey spirit is that our musical critics are not, as a rule, musicians by training—that they have not passed through the schools, and therefore present no recognised credentials; that, likewise as a rule, they are unknown either as creative or executive musicians, and were never heard of till suddenly found on the judgment seat. I object that all this is beside the main question, and would be so even if the statements made were wholly true, which assuredly they are not. A critic stands or falls by his professional utterances. If these be fair and honest, well-informed and properly expressed, it matters not one jot whether he have the whole alphabet after his name or not a single letter; whether he be a sudden product of obscurity or has moved to his post with beat of drum and blast of trumpet. A tree is known by its fruit, not by anything that happened or did not happen during the period of early growth and bloom.

Apart from this fundamental consideration, it is fairly open to doubt whether a musical training, as it is called, though in itself an excellent thing, can be regarded, under the circumstances, as an unmixed good. Let us suppose that, of two men equally endowed with musical sympathy, one enters a Royal Academy or Royal College at an impressionable age and submits himself to the special and always more or less limited influences of the place. At the end of four or five years he comes out, let us further imagine, a safe candidate for honours in the theory and practice of his art; but also bearing with him signs of a confined atmosphere, and evidence of taste derived, not from extended observation and experience in a wide circle, but from the authority and inevitable influence of a few professors. The other of the twain, let us say, pursues a course of independent study, reads much and well, carries an open and unbiassed mind wherever the best music is performed, and carefully builds up opinions with the impressions he has received. He may not be able to satisfy a University professor, but in nine cases out of ten he would make a better critic than his scholastic friend. It has sometimes been proposed to establish a college for the training of critics. Such an institution might turn out qualified musicians; it could never make the thing most wanted. A true critic, like a real poet, is born, not made. He evades the most ingenious process of manufacture, and generally develops, not in the class-room, but, so to speak, in the open air and under the sun. It is always so with the journalist proper. Some time ago, an enterprising newspaper man set up a school for training members of the Fourth Estate. I never heard that he turned out men whom editors were eager to engage. The true journalistic gift is a natural endowment, and its training comes of opportunity. There are newspaper correspondents with a better eye to the conduct of a campaign than the officers directing it, and who can not only vividly describe a battle, but successfully criticise its tactics. These are soldiers; without weapons or uniform, but none the less soldiers in knowledge and judgment. As with the out-and-out journalist, so with his colleague who is a journalist only in the realm of music; and the fact may help to explain how it comes to pass that, when an editor wishes to engage a critic, he rarely seeks one in the ranks of professional musicians. It need scarcely be added that he has, in some degree, to consider a literary qualification, and to exact evidence of a mind which can pass from lively to severe, showing itself equally interesting and instructive in both.

Myself a critic, I shall, perhaps, be regarded as a partial judge of the criticism we now have. But necessary detachment of mind and feeling from partiality is simplified in my case by the fact that the time is rapidly passing which divides many years of activity from the moment in which work will cease. Were I now bidding adieu to criticism, I should regard it, if not with absolute content, at least with satisfaction and hope. I hold that, generally speaking, it is honest and able; that it is not, as a rule, warped and distorted by prejudice; that, taken as a whole, its excesses are balanced by its prudent reserves, and its tendency to heedless change is counteracted by the conservative spirit which never deserts Englishmen long together. I contend further, that our present-day criticism is carried on in a generous mood and with an enlightened mind. There are exceptions, no doubt, for what human institution exists quite apart from proof that humanity is imperfect? The matter is one for a comprehensive estimate, and, weighing defects against merits, the merits vastly preponderate. That is the opinion of one who has nothing whatever to gain by stating what he does not regard as truth. I wish it were possible to make composers and artists—the great army of the criticised—see eye to eye with me in this matter. It is not possible. The man whose doings are unfavourably judged will, in his heart if not openly, contest the verdict and disparage the tribunal. He will set it down to incompetence or wilful injustice. If eulogised with discrimination, he will complain of the faint praise which damns, while, if neither praised nor blamed, he possibly brings an action for damages. This is so natural that it disarms censure—the censure of those, at any rate, who ask themselves what they would be likely to do under similar circumstances. All of us in these matters need a large spirit of tolerance, which is the spirit of charity, and that is why I wish to see a modification in the attitude of the criticised towards their censors. The more difficult the exercise of any virtue, the more honour it brings to its possessor, and no musician would lose by crediting criticism with honesty of purpose, however much he may deem it mistaken. May I also urge, in my position as a senior, that an improvement in the attitude of critics toward each other is not beyond the limit of possibility? We are too apt to bestow upon our colleagues the attention which should be given to the art we in common love and serve. Music is a wide subject, and there is room in it for a diversity of opinions, all of which should be represented in the field of criticism. As a matter of fact, they are in evidence, and together form a mass of testimony on the basis of which intelligent readers can each for himself found or modify his own judgments. The fact that one of us contributes an opinion to that mass, while our neighbour supplies another, is really no reason for enmity, for waiting to catch him tripping in order to "show him up," or for stirring the waters of strife in any other form. Each man does his duty according to his light, and he has a right so to act. Let us recognise that fact and leave the consequences to public discrimination. Anyhow, no good comes of letting our angry passions rise, and placing ourselves as a body on the level of a parish vestry. Think of the art, and what we individually can do for it with all sincerity and devotion. That is enough to engage our energies, and there lies the plain path of duty, of honour, and of fit reward.

Joseph Bennett.

FROM MY STUDY.

Among the minor poets of Scotland one George Bruce has a place. He "flourished" at the beginning of the present century, and from time to time issued small collections of verse, such as "Poems and Songs on Various Occasions" (1812); "Poems, Ballads, and Songs on Various Occasions" (1813); "Edinburgh: a Poem in the Scottish Dialect," and "The Musical Festival: a Poem in the Scottish Dialect" (1815). It is because of the last-named that I mention George Bruce here.

It appears that a musical festival was held in Edinburgh some time in the year of Waterloo, and that the managers, not content with local talent, imported executants of various kinds from England. This gave deep offence to some perfervid patriots, of whom George Bruce was one; they contending, no doubt, as did the late Professor Blackie after them, that a pipe-tune and a song racy of the soil were worth all the classical music in the world. Bruce's poem is a remonstrance with the festival committee on the ground of their flaccid nationality, but it begins with an invocation of its author's insulted country:

Auld Scotia, land o' music sweet,
For your poor sons I maist cou'd greet;
Sair, sair neglected in yon leet
O' foreign cattle.
Weel, gin Pegasus keep his feet,
They's get a rattle.

O Scotia's sons, far fam'd's your sang;
It's borne the gree, right high, fu' lang;
Now your own kintramen, to wrang
Ye o' your right,
Bring squallin' strangers ye amang!
Plagues on them light.

The poet wants to know why "Edina's bairns" are not engaged, but left to starve, and then proceeds energetically:

How hard it is to see frae Lunnon
Birkies come down, by trick and cunnin',
To seize our bread—faith, that's nae funnin'
To hungry folks.
O sage Directors, count your winnin'
To the poor's box.

These wise Directors now will gie
Pounds fifty to tum-tweedle-dee,
When they at home, believe ye me,
Had gotten better
For guineas twelve; it's thus, ye see,
The cash they scatter.

The poet demands why "Fraser's note" was not heard at the festival, and why "Thomson's double-bass" came to be passed over. These were, it appears, local performers of repute; but the poet has others also in his mind:

In this guid town there's mony mair
That I could name, musicians rare,
Who in a Concert often bare
A part right sweet;
Now for an idiot's skirl an' rair
They're left complete.

It grieves me sair to see neglected
Our ain—an' foreign loons protected;
Because a Scotsman you're rejected,
Whate'er your merit,
While Signor Squallina's respected,
An' drinks his claret.

The poet, after passing in review the fortunes of Affleck, Fergusson, and Burns, is not so much excited as to deny any patronage to foreigners, but he shows caution withal:

Let foreigners aye ha'e a share
O' patronage, when we'v't to spare,
But first we should our ain fo'k sair,
O' talents bright;
This is but doing justice fair
To ilka wight.

Enforcing this claim for precedence, he waxes aflame:

How cou'd ye hae the face ava'
To offer to some guineas twa?
Ye cou'd na gie ane less to blaw
Your Organ fine.
Wha cou'd decern the least at a'
Maun see design.

How cou'd ye gie ane hundreds three,
Tho' he may stand in first degree?
Can ony just proportion be 'Tween guineas twa
Offered to ane whom, wee'l ken ye,
Nane match'd here saw.

Had ye been stinted in your means,
An' your projections wanted frien's,
Ilk ane whase mind to Music leans
Wad ye assisted,
An' ilk Musician's heart sae keen's
'Thout cash he'd listed.

But whan o' means ye had right plenty
Ye had nae need to be sae tenty,
An' offers make so small an' genty
To poor Scotch chiels;
But this I trust's a sma' momento
To him who feels.

The poet finally dismisses the committee with "Don't do it again":

Now fare ye weel, ye sage Directors,
May ye o' Genius be protectors;
I gie ye credit as projectors,
Gude was your plan,
But ne'er o' merit be neglectors,
Nor gut its ban.

There may be a disposition in some quarters to republish this poem with a dedication to the directors of the Imperial Institute.

The author of "Moore's Irish Melodies" is sufficiently near music to warrant a paragraph concerning him here. Looking through an album of autographs which lately came into my possession, I found a stained, ragged-edged half-sheet of letter paper, written on both sides, headed "A Sonnet to Miss Dodd," and subscribed "Thomas Moore." This is, apparently, a first sketch, as corrections appear in various places. We may conclude also that the so-called "Sonnet" was a boyish effort. Here it is, for the reader's judgment:

Thus let me pay a tribute justly due
For all the kindness I've received from you—
You who to me another mother prov'd,
And whom I, thankful, as a mother lov'd.
This young attempt of mine at verses take,
The sole return (that) I as yet can make;

For could I place you on great Britain's throne,
I'd think it little for the love you've shown.
Where'er I go your image shall bear sway,
And cast a beam of pleasure o'er my way;
Whilst I on former hours long pass'd reflect,
Remembrance will excite my love, respect;
And may I once again such kindness feel,
And may this heart be rendered hard as steel
If ever I forget your tender love,
Which even Time shall not from thence remove.
While life remains, or that I pen can raise
Both shall be given to sound your lasting praise,
To make thee 'bove all other mortals rise,
T' extol your many virtues to the skies.
If far away I should be any time,
In looking o'er this unconnected rhyme,
A thought or two at most you may give sure
To him who grateful wrote it—Thomas Moore.

Our young author was dissatisfied with the penultimate line (no wonder!), ran his pen through it, and attempted another. But he stopped half-way, getting no farther than "It may to memory." The juvenility of the writer is obvious throughout, while even as a youthful effort the "Sonnet" nowhere foreshadows the mellifluous strains of later years. Yet it is interesting withal.

Readers of Longfellow's "King Olaf," and those who know Mr. Elgar's work of the same name, may have been struck with the grim refrain, "Dead rides Sir Morten of Fogelsang," and some may have wondered where it came from and how it got into "Olaf." The line is found in a Danish ballad, "Sir Morten of Fogelsang," where it follows each quatrain. An English version of the ballad has been made by Robert Buchanan, and appears in his "Ballad Stories of the Affections. From the Scandinavian" (1869). Another translation may be found in that admirable work, "Ancient Danish Ballads translated from the Originals by R. C. Alexander Prior, M.D." (1860). Of the two renderings Buchanan's is, perhaps, the most characteristic. It begins with Sir Morten's death and burial:

It was Sir Morten of Fogelsang,
He rode in greenwood lawn,
And there a fatal blow gat he,
All in the morning dawn.
Dead rides Sir Morten of Fogelsang!

To kirk he gave the red, red gold,
To cloister gave his horse;
All in the black and chilly earth
They laid Sir Morten's corse.
Dead rides Sir Morten of Fogelsang!

Here follows, in Prior's version, a stanza the equivalent of which does not appear in Buchanan:

All heaped with earth, as best they could,
They left his buried corse,
But ere the toll of midnight bell,
He rose and mounted horse.

The ballad goes on to tell how the spectre followed "good Sir Folmer Skot," begging him to hear its story—a story of land stolen from two orphans, to whom restitution must be made ere the dead knight can rest in his grave—

O haste to Mettelil, my wife,
And tell her my behest:
Until she yield the ground again,
My soul can never rest!

Should the lady desire a token—

Say that my chamber slippers lie
Without my chamber door,
And if she look at dead of night,
They will be full of gore.

Sir Folmer Skot swears to convey the message, and what follows is best told by Prior—

And all in black Sir Morten went Down to his dark abode,
And black were both his hawk and hound,
And troop that with him rode.

It is to be hoped that never after could it be said "Dead rides Sir Morten of Fogelsang!"

In the preface to his volume, Robert Buchanan states that the refrain of the Danish ballad is used by Longfellow "for no earthly purpose." There may be two opinions on that point. The refrain has as much to do with its surroundings in "King Olaf" as many other things of the kind with the connection in which they appear, and there is a grim suggestiveness about it which exactly suited the purpose of the American poet.

In order that its readers may see at a glance what is doing on the lyric stage, our new French contemporary, the Revue Internationale de Musique, gives a list of works performed during the fortnight preceding the date of issue. I have taken the trouble to examine the list in a recent number. Within the two weeks reviewed there were twenty-eight performances of German opera and music-drama. Of French opera, 102 representations took place, and of Italian opera, thirty-nine. The great predominance of French works is here asserted very strongly. Of the twenty-eight German performances, fifteen were of works by Wagner. It should be added that the review covers seventy theatres.

THE designation, "First Annual Concert," has a pleasant ring about it, not only of "something attempted, something done," but of future possibilities of high attainment. Especially is this the case in so interesting a connection as St. George's School, Windsor Castle. Although this initial music-making of the school, given on the 13th ult., "under the patronage of Her Majesty the Queen," was of a somewhat private nature, the programme calls for more than passing comment, not only in regard to the variety of pieces sung and played by the boys, but also in relation to some of the composers represented on that occasion. The concert opened with a Gavotte (à la mode ancienne) by Sir George Elvey, "organist of St. George's Chapel, 1835-1882," in which four of the boys played first and second violin parts. Later on came three songs by Dr. H. W. Davies, who, as the programme duly recorded, was "chorister of St. George's Chapel, 1882-1885, assistant-organist, 1885-1890; Mus. Doc. and organist of the Temple Church, 1898"; and in Part II. a couple of two-part songs were sung by "The Scholars" (words by C. Rosetti), entitled "Golden silences" and "Bird Raptures," composed by Dr. G. F. Huntley, "assistant-organist, St. George's Chapel, 1875-1880, organist of St. Peter's, Eaton Square, 1896." As a former organist and two former assistant-organists of St. George's had places in the scheme, the programme would have suffered from a want of completeness if the present distinguished occupant of the organ-loft, Sir Walter Parratt, had not been represented. The Master of the Queen's Music appeared as the composer of a vigorous song, "The Knight's leap," set to Kingsley's words, and sung by the Rev. A. G. Langdon. Another interesting feature in this excellent programme was the name of C. H. H. Parry, "sometime pupil of Sir G. Elvey," as the composer of a "Prelude" for violin, "The Poet's Song" (to Tennyson's words), and a six-part song, "Tell me, O love" (words from Elizabethan Song Book). We shall "keep an eye" on future annual concerts in connection with this admirable school. Meanwhile, the thought naturally arises of the possibility that some of the boys who took part in this recent concert under the shadow of the fine old Castle may find their names on the roll of distinguished musicians. We hope they will.

Here is an examination story for the authenticity of which we can absolutely vouch. Its "behind the scenes" nature will doubtless make it of special interest to those who seek to get on, or get honours, by degrees. Wild horses will not drag from us the name of the University where the incident occurred. The examiners were the Professor of Music, a distinguished foreign musician, and an eminent Cathedral organist, who related to us the story in the following abridged form: The Professor, in composing an oratorio, had undergone a course of special reading with —— (ah! the name must be withheld) on the Old Church Modes. With a natural desire to test the candidates in his newly acquired knowledge, he had set some Old Church Mode questions in the paper. When the vivâ voce portion of the examination came on, the distinguished foreigner said (somewhat confidentially) to the eminent cathedralist, "I don't know anything about Old Church Modes." "No more do I," was the frank reply of his colleague. It may therefore be assumed that when the examinees came up for their vivâ voce, the modus operandi of two out of the three learned examiners was to look very wise as the Professor put his Old Church Mode interrogatories to the luckless candidates. With a natural hankering after the dates of important historical musical events, we asked our genial friend if he could give the year of the incident. "No," he replied, "I'm afraid I can't.—But ask ——. He knows. He was plucked!"

Four hundred years ago—on May 25, 1498—Ottaviano dei Petrucci, "the father of the art of type-music printing," obtained from the Seignory at Venice the sole privilege, for twenty years, of printing "figured music" (canto figurato), and music in the tablature of the organ and lute—a privilege which he exercised there until 1511. Petrucci's process was a double one. He printed first the lines of the stave, and then, by a second impression, the notes upon them. His work is beautifully executed, and the whole effect of his music-printing is admirable. But the process, which was very expensive, was soon superseded by printing in one impression, which is supposed to have been first successfully accomplished by Oglin of Augsburg, in 1507, though there seems to be some doubt on this point. Petrucci (born June 18, 1466, died May 7, 1539) is said to have been "richer in ideas than in cash." His life and work are fully treated in "A sketch of the history of music-printing, from the fifteenth to the nineteenth century," a most valuable series of articles which Dr. Friedrich Chrysander contributed to the columns of The Musical Times in 1877.

Last month we referred to the gratifying improvement in the selection of songs sung by the students in the various Training Colleges in England and Wales, as reported to the Education Department by Sir John Stainer, Her Majesty's Inspector, and Dr. McNaught, his assistant. We are now enabled to supplement the information we then gave with the following list of works. It should be remembered that they were not sung, as might be assumed, by professional students at musical academies, but by the future schoolmistresses and schoolmasters of the elementary schools up and down the country.

"Jephtha"	Handel.
"The Seasons"	Haydn.

This list does not include the part-songs and other short pieces that were sung. Moreover, in addition to the above, each of the 2,050 senior students sang a song with pianoforte accompaniment. Capital!

The Feis Ceoil is to be held in Belfast from the 2nd to the 7th inst. With characteristic Irish warm-heartedness, the Belfast Committee have expressed their desire to extend hospitality to certain members of the London press who will attend the festival. We hope to give a full report of the proceedings in our next issue.

The death, on the 13th ult., of Miss Margaret Rose Smart, the only child of the late Sir George Smart, severs a link with the musical life of London of long ago. Miss Smart died at 12, Bedford Square, the house in which, on February 23, 1867, her father drew his last breath, in his ninety-first year. But it is Smart's former house—in Great Portland Street (now numbered 103)—that is so rich in musical associations. His most distinguished guest there was Carl Maria von Weber, who lived—if he can be said to have lived—the last three months of his short life under Smart's hospitable roof. The composer of "Der Freyschütz" entered the house on March 5, 1826, and on June 4, exactly thirteen weeks afterwards, he passed away in his sleep in the front room on the second floor. A tablet, placed in the front of the house a few years ago by the London section of the Incorporated Society of Musicians, records Weber's pathetic end.

Thackeray, in his "The Ravenswing" (the first of the short stories forming "Men's Wives"), has immortalised Sir George Smart in the character "Sir George Thrum," the "Thrum" being presumably a Lord Dundrearyish way of pronouncing "Strum." The author of "Vanity Fair" hits off Sir George Smart, one of the great musical men of the day, in his own inimitable manner. The great novelist also has a satirical and well deserved tilt at the doggrel which passed for poetry in the opera librettos and songs of the early part of the century, not that this commodity is above reproach in this respect in the present day. Thackeray depicts the incidents of a musical party given by Sir George Thrum at his house in Great Portland Street. In the course of the evening, the host, addressing three of his guests, says: "Miss Horsman, Mr. Craw, my dear Mrs. Ravenswing, shall we begin the trio? Silence, gentlemen, if you please. It is a little piece from my opera of the 'Brigand's Bride.' Miss Horsman takes the Page's part; Mr. Craw is Stiletto, the Brigand; my accomplished pupil is the Bride'—and the music began:

The Bride (sings).
My heart with joy is beating,
My eyes with tears are dim.

The Page.
Her heart with joy is beating,
Her eyes are fixed on him.

The Brigand.
My heart with rage is beating,
In blood my eye-balls swim."

The central figure in the musical world used to be the prima donna; but the development of the modern orchestra and Wagner have changed all that, and the conductor has ousted the diva from pride of place. Wherever one looks—London, New York, Berlin, Paris, Vienna—it is the conductor question which is agitating people's minds. As regards New York, to quote the lively Mr. Finck, "our fate will depend on whom Maurice Grau succeeds in capturing. Will it be Richter, Mottl, Richard Strauss, Weingartner, Lohse, or Muck? Nikisch is bound to Leipzig for life by an engagement and a life insurance, and Gericke is only a concert conductor." It is strange that, in spite of the tremendous premium upon all things Slavonic, no great Russian or Polish conductor has yet emerged above the horizon. Perhaps, however, he will come from Finland, or some of the outlying portions of the Russian Empire. Meantime the prevailing tendency is sufficiently illustrated by a reference to the artists engaged at the Philharmonic, the list including the names of Gabrilowitsch, Gregorowitsch, Dvorák, Moszkowski, and Adamowski. To revert for a moment to the question of the nationality of conductors, it is a curious fact that the most popular musician in America, the Strauss of the United States, Mr. J. P. Sousa, the composer of the "Washington Post," is by name, at least, next door to a Spaniard, the Sousas being a well-known Portuguese family.

It is wonderful what a talent some people display for elaborately futile investigation—such as counting how many times the letter a occurs in Shakespeare, or ascertaining how many copies of The Times it would take to paper the entire earth. One of these laborious triflers has recently discovered that M is a very important letter in music, because so many composers' names begin with it—e.g., Mozart, Méhul, Meyerbeer, Mendelssohn, Marschner, Millöcker, Mascagni, Massenet, Mercadante, Molique, &c. M undoubtedly makes a good show, but B has an even more impressive record. For to it are to be referred Bach, Beethoven, Brahms, Byrd, Buononcini, Bülow, Braham, Borodin, Bellini, Berlioz, Bizet, Balfe, and Boïto. Aspirants to fame, whose names do not begin with either of these letters, will thus have the gratifying knowledge that their success may go some way towards reducing the disproportionate amount of prestige which attaches to B and M. The letter X, for example, is entirely devoid of celebrity at present in the matter of music, unless we stretch a point in favour of the Xylophone.

It was Dr. Aldrich who wrote a catch on tobacco. We have just heard of a tobacco catch. A distinguished British composer, about to start on a railway journey, and wishing to avoid the fumes of a certain weed, entered a carriage upon which the word "smoking" did not appear. The only other occupants were three ladies, and our British composer therefore considered that he was safe. During the journey they partook of luncheon. At the end of their repast, one of these lady travellers turned to the distinguished British composer and asked him: "Do you object to smoking?" Whatever the reply may have been, they forthwith proceeded to light up their cigarettes. Without making any comment upon this species of puffery as practised by the fair sex, we may assume that the precautions taken by the composer-traveller ended in smoke.

It happened down Devonshire way. A village situated in that cream-rations region was recently visited by an eminent Cathedral organist from afar, who consented to play at a service. The organist of the church was a lady. She told the eminent visitor that they used the ——— chant-book, and, as if to allay any nervousness on his part, she added, "all the chants this evening are taken from your book because you know them."

FACTS, RUMOURS, AND REMARKS.

Some of us were a little surprised, and much more amused, when Mr. Leon Schlesinger was represented as writing to the Revue Internationale de Musique about "La mauvaise humeur gallophobe" shown by English musical critics. The expression was used àpropos to the recent performance of Saint-Saëns's "Danse Macabre," at Queen's Hall, and it naturally interested me as one of those who resented the sandwiching of that work between two great classical masterpieces. Now it turns out that Mr. Schlesinger did not use the words at all. Some part of his "copy" was lost in the Revue office, and then reproduced from the memory of a person who had perused it. That gentleman seems to have fancied at one moment that he was engaged upon a leader in the interest of Anglophobia. The Revue should mend its ways.

The stewards of the Gloucester Festival have again had before them a proposal to admit women to the stewardship, and again have they rejected it. There is, I believe, no precedent for such a step, and in any assembly of Englishmen precedent goes a long way. No doubt other reasons as well as this influenced the voting, to say nothing of the general principle that it is better to bear the ills we have than fly to others which we know not of.

Mr. William Armstrong informs me of the gratifying reception given in America to his lectures on English music and composers. He says: "I shall keep on in this line. Thursday next I leave on a tour as far as the Pacific coast. The plan made for me covers about 6,000 miles. At the Leland Stanford University in California I shall give the 'British Song Composers,' and at other points as well. I want to make English compositions better known in America, and the American ones better known in England." In this enterprise I heartily wish my able transatlantic colleague all the success he can himself desire.

One evening not long since, I found myself in an opera box with ten or a dozen French critics. We were gathered to hear some new compositions, published in the morning of the same day, and it struck me as very curious that not one of my companions had a copy of the works. The fact put me to shame and confusion of face. I was bound to assume that my Parisian brethren had somehow or other become familiar with the novelties, and needed not, as I did, to follow the performance score in hand. It is true that, on reading their articles the next morning, I found little evidence of such intimacy.

Madame Melba appears to have enlisted in the noble army of those who hoax. A discussion having arisen as to whether a certain eminent violinist then present could earn a dollar an hour by playing in the street, Madame Melba took the negative side and is reported as saying—

"I have my own experience to base my opinion upon. Why," continued the great singer, laughing, "we tried just such an experiment last summer at my country home in England. Joachim was visiting us and a certain celebrated 'cellist, when one afternoon the idea of a great frolic occurred to us. We put on old clothes and out we sallied, all three, and took up our positions on one of the locks on the Thames and there we made music for two whole hours; Joachim and the 'cellist played and I sang. And now how much money do you suppose we took in? Just seven shillings and sixpence, or $1.87!"

The eminent violinist was nicely "had." He believed the story.

One of the Vanderbilts — Jessie Vanderbilt McNamee of that ilk—has written and composed a song. She is not a descendant of the Old Commodore, that famous millionaire having been, in fact, her great-uncle. But the advent of a Vanderbilt in music and verse seems to open up a new field of solace for those whom wealth weighs down.

American critics are scarcely expected to pay indiscriminate homage to venerable and illustrious names. They are free and independent, especially one of them, who writes as follows: "The Beethoven Sonata, Op. 110, is by no means among the most popular of the great composer's works, nor is there any reason that it should be. The opening movement is devoid of interest to the general listener. The cantabile molto espressivo does not seem to express anything in particular. It suggests an exercise. The awful thought that Jupiter sometimes nods comes to mind when one reflects that this is a Beethoven work." Real courage was required to say this, and my transatlantic colleague proves its possession. I only regret that it is not associated with better judgment.

It is stated that the Arion Society of Milwaukee has abandoned the idea of performing Dr. Stanford's "Requiem" and taken up with Goring Thomas's "The Swan and the Skylark." No reason is assigned, but probably the Society found the sacred work more than it could master.

A play in one act, entitled "Adelaide," and written around Beethoven's song of that name, has recently been produced in America. It is the work of a German, who introduces the great master as one of his dramatis personæ, the others being Frau Lachner, Beethoven's housekeeper; Clara, the landlady's daughter, who is also a musician and copyist; and Adelaide, a great lady with whom the master is in love. Of course the famous song is introduced, and its recorded history, what there is of it, enters into the scenes. Beethoven has nothing to sing; but he fills an important place in the drama, and was represented, at the production of the play, by Mr. Bispham, in a manner "pathetic, dignified, and touching."

In his book, "What is Good Music?" Mr. W. J. Henderson, the distinguished American critic, observes: "Judging from observation extending over a tolerable number of years, I should say that out of every one thousand persons who attend piano recitals, about one has any real knowledge of good piano playing." Mr. Henderson's figures are probably designed rather for emphasis than precision; but it is quite certain that "real knowledge" among the attendants upon fashionable pianists does not go very far.

Formidable indictments have been repeatedly brought against Frau Wagner's management of the Bayreuth Festivals, and Wagnerians have taken part in them. Now we have Herr Weingartner writing as thus: "This lady, not a German, does not know how to preserve the sacred traditions of the great master, nullifying his ideas, turning Bayreuth into a simple speculation, and importing strange singers, so as to attract the money of all sorts of foreigners." How much truth, if any, there is in these statements I do not know, and, to say sooth, I do not greatly care; but in any case, Herr Weingartner would have done better to refrain from polemics, especially from attacking a woman who has to bear the burden of a great name and an immense responsibility. Since when, by the way, has it been an offence to attract into Germany the money of "all sorts of foreigners"?

We may expect shortly to hear what Aggressive Feminity thinks of the writer who, in the Sketch, is now discoursing serially upon "The Failures of Women in Art." No doubt it will reply with emphasis, and at some little length; especially on reading this sentence: "Yet, upon looking back calmly and judiciously along the whole range of modern music, I do not think that you will find one name of one woman who by a musical creative genius has attained to any summit of greatness." This judgment is rather awkwardly expressed, yet it is sufficiently definite, and Woman must meet it, it at all, with convincing facts. The writer goes on to deal with particular cases, but I need not follow him. My opinion upon the whole matter was expressed in these columns some years ago, and I have since found no reason to change it. In music, as in other things, some are apostles and some prophets; some bear the seed and others carry the fruit to the ends of the earth. After all, I think, Woman may be satisfied with her brilliant position as an interpreter of great musical thoughts. But whether or no, nothing can change what is, apparently, an order of nature.

Colonel Mapleson is the phœnix of the operatic world. He may be burnt to ashes in the flame of bad luck, but in those ashes live his wonted fires, and, sooner or later, he rises from them majestically. There is a present example in the "New Italian Opera Syndicate, Limited," which is to start this season at the "New Italian Opera House," otherwise the New Olympic Theatre. I recognise here the work of the redoubtable and indestructible impresario. The scheme is, of course, a large one; and, should it succeed, will do much good. For this it is welcome, and amateurs will hope that managerial wisdom and public support may bring it to a happy issue.

I met Dr. Richter in Paris during his engagement at the Colonne concerts, and we fell to talking of the situation at Covent Garden consequent upon Seidl's death. The Doctor then used language which encouraged no hope of his accepting the vacant post. "I must have rest," he said emphatically. The next day I met Mr. Schulz-Curtius in the street. It was not difficult to divine his mission.

Lovers of Chopin's music will rejoice at the promised visit of Vladimir de Pachmann. Where the Polish composer's works are concerned it may be said, "There is none like him, none."

CHURCH MUSIC.

Obviously at the close of the greatest epoch of the Church's year, one's first duty is to note the marked increase in the earnestness and artistic thoroughness with which the musical offices have been rendered far and wide during the closing weeks of Lent and of Eastertide. Regarding the selection of music, it is satisfactory to note the abiding and, in fact, increasing interest, taken by lovers of Church music in those masterpieces of sacred art, Bach's settings of the "Passion" according to the gospel narratives of St. Matthew and St. John.

In connection with the former work, the fine and impressive rendering under Sir George Martin's direction in St. Paul's Cathedral claims special record. Of the latter, the performances in St. Anne's, Soho, and Marylebone Parish Church, to name only two typical churches, also claim notice.

Settings of that noble old twelfth century Hymn, the "Stabat Mater," have been very frequently heard in our churches of both Anglican and Roman Communions, and, it may be noted, frequently in the original Latin in Anglican churches. Whilst Rossini's melodious and somewhat sensuous "Stabat Mater" maintains its hold upon public favour, other versions are finding increased recognition—as, for instance, Dvorák's noble setting. In this connection one regrets that Pergolesi's beautiful version for soprano voices and stringed instruments is so little heard, and that Astorga's setting is so unworthily overlooked; though it has been stated, with apparent authority, that this work was composed for the "Society of Ancient Musick," in London, and given in Oxford as long ago as 1713, possibly at or about the time of the composer's visit to this country.

Of works which have come more to the fore or have been first heard in our midst in connection with the solemn season recently passed, mention should be made of Graun's "Der Tod Jesu," an oratorio still retaining the respect of many German lovers of sacred music, after the popularity of more than a century, and the chief work of a musician who practically commenced and closed a notable career by the composition of two "Grosse Passions-Cantatas." Other Church oratorios given of late with more or less frequency have been Mendelssohn's "Christus," Haydn's "Seven Last Words," Gounod's "Redemption," Spohr's "Calvary" (at St. Paul's, Kilburn, under the direction of the Rev. H. G. Bonavia Hunt), and the first act of Wagner's "Parsifal," under the direction of Mr. E. H. Lemare, at St. Margaret's, Westminster, and also at the Church of the Annunciation, Old Quebec Street. Stainer's "Crucifixion" has been impressively given at Marylebone Parish Church; St. James's, Forest Gate; St. George's (Presbyterian Church), Brondesbury; St. Peter's, College Park; and at many other churches. Stainer's "St. Mary Magdalen" at St. John's, Grantham, &c. One satisfactory feature of Church oratorio and festival services—and especially on Easter Day—has been a large increase in the employment of orchestral accompaniments.

In dealing with the recent rendering of the "Vorspiel" and half of the first act of "Parsifal" at the Church of the Annunciation, Old Quebec Street, under the direction of that able organist, Mr. Cuthbert Hawley, with organ and brass instruments, the Pall Mall Gazette has some observations of special interest. The following are among the remarks thus made:—

When "Parsifal" was first produced, the subject with which it dealt naturally involved it to a certain extent in religious controversy. On the one hand, there were those who found in it the most poignant and reverent allegory of the Christian conception of the redemption of the world, and, on the other hand, there were many pious people who turned away from it with a kind of horror as though it ventured upon an excessive familiarity with sacred things. This feeling, including a sentiment which confessed itself strongly upon the Graal festival of the first act, was voiced pretty vigorously, if we remember rightly, by Dr. William Barry. Wagner was accused not only of these particular enormities, but also of a deliberate travesty of the service of the Mass. That was of course absurd; and fervent Roman Catholics like the Marquis of Bute and Mr. C. T. Gasty rushed into the fray, waving high the banner of Wagner; so that a very pretty little controversy raged for some time upon the question of the moral and religious tendency of "Parsifal." On the whole, even at that time—it is now more than six years ago—the defenders of Wagner had very much the best of it, although we rather doubt if he would have been exceedingly delighted with all the opinions and motives which his admirers fitted into his festival drama. But since then the voice of the scoffer has been almost dumb; and the only quiet objectors to the reverential spirit of "Parsifal" are the few excellent Church people, scattered here and there, who, admiring the music hugely, "think that such a representation upon the stage goes a little too closely towards associating the profane and the vulgar." In immediately recent days, however, the Church in England has adopted an entirely different view of the matter, thanks chiefly to the vigour and capability of several among the younger organists, whose minds are not warped and whose judgments are not narrowed by prejudice.

At a recent meeting of the Society of Antiquaries, Mr. E. M. Simpson reported the discovery, owing to the removal of the old organ, of the remnant of a semi-octagonal flight of steps, originally leading to a platform projecting Eastwards towards the chancel of Lincoln Cathedral, from which the Epistle and Gospel were intoned on Festival days. This interesting discovery gives some slight insight into the elaborate and grand methods of conducting public worship in the days of old. The priest thus elevated and intoning in simple yet stately plain-chant inflections the inspired words in the great church, would present a figure of prophetic dignity before a great assembly of worshippers. We have probably yet much to learn regarding the grandeur and picturesque nobility of the services once held in our stately cathedrals.

Mr. F. A. W. Docker is compiling a history of the music of St. Andrew's, Wells Street, in which church he himself has done admirable work for many years. His narrative will extend over half-a-century, and will not only include much of interest concerning his predecessor, Sir Joseph Barnby, Gounod, and other eminent musical men, but will be of value as dealing with the development of Church music in our day; a movement with which St. Andrew's, Wells Street, has been identified in a marked degree.

Graun's "Der Tod Jesu" was sung at St. Chad's, Headingley, Leeds, upon a recent occasion, ably accompanied by Mr. H. P. Richardson. The choir of the church sang the difficult and sometimes exacting music very effectively. The vicar, the Rev. W. H. Stables, delivered an instructive address on the historical and religious aspects of the "Passion" music. At Montreux (Switzerland) the English Choral Society did good work at St. John's Church, on the 2nd ult., by a performance of Mendelssohn's 42nd Psalm ("As the hart pants") and Bunnett's 130th Psalm ("Out of the deep"). The choirs of many of the English churches scattered about the Continent are displaying great earnestness and are making excellent progress.

On several successive Sundays Mr. J. H. Maunder's cantata "Penitence, Pardon, and Peace," a thoughtful and effective work, was given at the Parish Church, Newport, Shropshire, under the guidance of Mr. Smart, the organist; on March 25, at St. Margaret's, Burton-on-Trent, under Dr. A. B. Plant; and on March 31, at the Parish Church, Loughton, under the direction of Mr. F. Brand. An excellent rendering of Gounod's "Messe Solennelle" was given at St. Michael's Church, Ryde, on Easter Day. Miss Margaret Fowles, the esteemed organist, has just completed her twentieth year of work in this church.

Dr. Pearce's Passion cantata, "The Man of Sorrows," was sung in Holy Week at Christ Church, Crouch End, with the composer at the organ and with Mr. A. J. Dye as conductor. At the Southwark Collegiate Church excellent renderings have been given of Stainer's "St. Mary Magdalen" and Gounod's "Messe Solennelle." A selection from "The Messiah" was given on the evening of Easter Day. The choir now numbers between sixty and seventy voices, and the music was under the guidance of Dr. A. Madeley Richardson.

ORGAN MUSIC.

After praiseworthy official and personal exertions the Dean and Chapter of Lincoln Cathedral find it necessary to make another appeal for the remaining £322 14s. 9d., necessary to pay for their fine new four-manual organ now being built by the eminent firm of Henry Willis and Sons. The main features of the expenditure are the cost of the organ, £3,605, and for the electric blowing apparatus, £357 10s. It is not too much to expect the many lovers of organ music to support the Cathedral authorities and their distinguished organist, Dr. G. J. Bennett, in their desire to worthily complete the furnishing of their noble Cathedral and to lend increased dignity to its fine musical services.

From a neighbouring county comes another and similar appeal. Mr. Samuel Reay, the esteemed organist and "Master of Song" of the beautiful Parish Church of Newark, is seeking aid to adequately enlarge the choir organ and to supply a gas engine for blowing purposes in connection with the large four-manual organ, over which he has presided for very many years. This instrument was originally built by George Pike England, in 1803. It has been enlarged and modernised by several skilled hands, notably by Mr. Henry Willis in 1866. Mr. Reay's claims upon the attention of local admirers of the stately church and its interesting organ will, it is hoped, not pass unheeded.

Mr. B. H. Lemare's admirable recitals at St. Margaret's, Westminster, have for some time commanded the attention of a large clientèle of admiring listeners. These excellent performances are given in part to secure means for the completion of Messrs. J. W. Walker and Son's fine organ, recently placed in the historic edifice just named. One selection includes an "Etude Symphonique" by Bossi (for the first time in England) and an artistic and effective Suite, for organ, violin, and violoncello, by that representative composer of German organ music, Herr Rheinberger. Another programme is made up entirely of selections from Wagner's dramatic works, headed by the "Kaiser" March. With every allowance for the mastery and resources of such a player as Mr. Lemare, such a scheme savours of excessive artistic courage. Not a few persons may question the growing tendency to present in church, compositions adapted for and specially associated with the stage. But apart from any views of a seemingly restrictive character, one feels the difficulty, if not the impossibility, of interpreting such music on the organ with a full measure of the composer's multiform and complicated orchestral effects; even granting that well skilled organists can do great things in the way of "sketching" large scores, and imitating, if not realising with more or less success, a great many orchestral points. The fixity of organ-tone is certainly not in favour of the presentation with full effect of the ever changing, almost restless, sometimes delicate and often subtle hues of tone-colour which crowd the scores of that great master of instrumentation and dramatic expression, Richard Wagner. Mr. Lemare's interesting experiments in this connection are listened to with a marked appreciation and with due admiration of his great skill.

From distant colonies come satisfactory tidings of excellent recitals. At Wellington, New Zealand, the scheme of a recent performance by Mr. W. Barnett, included works by Bach, Mendelssohn, and some living composers, including his own Berceuse, and Variations on Mendelssohn's theme associated with Wesley's Christmas Hymn; a theme also well treated on similar lines by Dr. C. J. Frost. Mr. W. Reed gave lately in Montreal, Canada, a recital with a programme including Mr. J. F. Barnett's excellent Offertoire in G, Gigout's Scherzo in E, and Guilmant's Marche Triumphale.

Admirably conceived performances devoted to the rendering of Bach's organ works are not uncommon, one is glad to observe. Mr. John Pullein has upon several recent occasions given such selections at St. Swithin's Church, Lincoln. These have included the Prelude in A minor, Fantasia in C minor, and that masterpiece of effective contrapuntal writing, the Passacaglia and Fugue in C minor. A programme recently played at St. Stephen's, Upton Park, by Mr. A. Eaglefield Hull, included an effective Toccata by Mailly, and other movements by the excellent professor of the organ at the Brussels Conservatoire.

At the Cathedral Church of St. Mary, Edinburgh, Mr. T. H. Collinson gave as one of his recitals a selection of music "cast in the form of an aid to meditation." In consonance with this suggestive and novel idea, the pieces included the "Good Friday" music from Wagner's "Parsifal," one of the few of the master's works which, on the whole, can be effectively reproduced as organ transcriptions; and movements from Haydn's "Seven Last Words," originally written in instrumental form as aids to meditation for a Good Friday service in Cadiz Cathedral.

An interesting series of recitals, given by Mr. John Lomas at the English Church of St. John's, Montreux, has recently terminated. The programmes included: Festival March (E. H. Thorne); Andante Religioso (No. 1), Thomé; Ricercare (No. 9, Op. 174), Rheinberger; Dudley Buck's "Evening" and "Triumphal March," together with organ works by Bach, Mendelssohn, and sundry modern German and French composers.

Mr. B. Jackson has given, during the past few weeks, some very interesting recitals at the People's Palace and elsewhere. His programmes have included Fantasie, Saint-Saëns; Cantilène, Wheeldon; March in C, Calkin; Benediction Nuptiale, d'Evry; a Fantasia on a Welsh Hymn, Roberts; Mr. Jackson's own variations on "St. Theodulph," and Fragment Symphonique, Lemaigre. A series of excellent performances has been given at St. Mary's, Newington, by Messrs. E. C. Bairstow, J. Capener, S. Chipperfield, Dr. A. Madeley Richardson, and Mr. B. Jackson. Mr. B. C. Thorne played a good programme at Sherborne School, on Easter Day. The new three-manual organ at Old Kilpatrick Parish Church, built by Messrs. Vowles, of Bristol, has been inaugurated by Mr. W. A. Donaldson. Mr. A. H. Brewer gave a recital in Gloucester Cathedral, on the 14th ult., with an excellent programme.

Mr. R. Sharpe gave a recital, at Romsey Abbey, on the 15th ult. His programme included Boëllmann's Gothic Suite. The programme of Mr. W. Blakeley's recital, at Queen's Park Church, Glasgow, included Delbruck's Berceuse in A.

NEW SACRED WORKS BY VERDI.

(By our Special Correspondent.)

At a "Concert Spirituel" given on the 7th ult. by the Société des Concerts du Conservatoire, at the Grand Opéra, three compositions by the Grand Old Man of music were performed in public for the first time. Why these works should receive notice in some degree special must be obvious to everybody. It is not alone that the composer ranks as the most illustrious of living musicians, but also that he has now given us the fruits of labour at eighty-five, and —which is absolutely remarkable—that these productions of venerable age have the spirit and power of youth.

The works in question were a "Stabat Mater," a setting for four female voices (unaccompanied) of the Hymn to the Virgin in the last Canto of Dante's "Paradiso," and a "Te Deum" for double chorus and orchestra. Before considering these things separately, it may be well to say that the first and third bear a general resemblance in character and treatment to the Manzoni "Requiem." They are distinct examples of sacred music according to the instinct and taste of the Latin peoples; that is to say, picturesque, impassioned, strong in colour, and powerful in appeal to the senses.

"Stabat Mater."

This setting of the beautiful old Latin Hymn is for a single chorus and orchestra, without solo passages. It runs to no great length, being all contained within twenty-five pages of pianoforte score. The key is G minor; the tempo, crotchet = 80, and the general direction for performance, is simply Sostenuto. The work opens with three bars of the tonic chord without its third, the indeterminateness of the bare fifth at once exciting interest and expectation. Ceasing at bar 4, the D leaves the G to prolong itself through four bars (sempre morendo), while the voices in unison have the following—

There is a fine effect of desolation about this opening which exactly hits the governing note of the poem. The stanza beginning "Cujus animam gementem" carries on the impression, largely by use in the orchestra of a syncopated figure—which plainly suggests a feature in the soprano part of the great "Rigoletto" quartet, where it serves for an expression of intense agitation and distress. The stanza ends with a 6-3 chord on B flat, and its successor opens with a touching device. The contraltos, followed by the tenors, exclaim thus (unaccompanied)— in close contiguity being a sharp contrast on the words "Mater Unigeniti," where loud, majestic dominant and tonic chords in C major strike a triumphant note. The next stanza, "Quae moerebat et dolebat," is attended by a new syncopated figure of accompaniment—against which, after three bars, the bass voices place a broadly phrased and sustained melody—

during the closing bars of which the syncopated figure is carried, in octaves, far up the heights of the violin scale, but always as softly as possible. Ending in F minor, this is followed by one of those delightfully tender and touching passages of full vocal harmony which are fully exemplified in the "Requiem." While expressing the feeling of the words ("Quis est homo," &c.), the composer here provides for a vivid contrast with "Pro peccatis," where, in the compass of eight bars, he delivers a master-stroke, the effect of which remains to the end of the piece. Attended by a new and agitated orchestral figure—working through a powerful instrumental crescendo up to a great climax, the voices proceed as below—

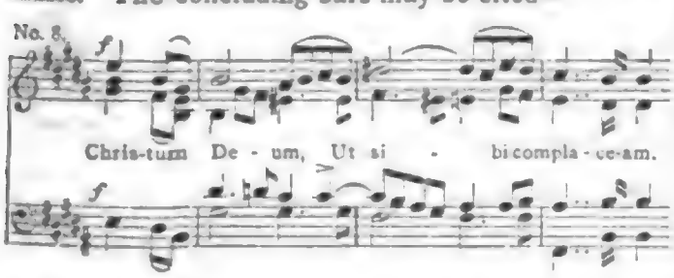
Now comes a touch of genius. On the last "diminished seventh" the horns enter with an E natural, sustained, amid the silence of voices and all other instruments, during three bars. Then chorus and orchestra softly re-enter, in the key of E major, and on the words "Vidit suum," with enchanting effect. The Paris audience thrilled to the touch. Between the stanza so treated and its successor is an orchestral interlude of eight bars, closing on the dominant seventh of B, in the major of which key we find an unaccompanied setting of the two stanzas, "Eia Mater," &c. Through fourteen bars this section presents a charming example of pure vocal music. The concluding bars may be cited—



In "Sancta Mater, istud agas," the agitated orchestral figure of "Pro peccatis" re-appears as an interlude between separate masses of vocal harmony. Here there is a modulation to C major, the key of an extended section, having a theme propounded by the contraltos—

This is "treated," in the full sense of the term, and serves the poem to the end of the line, "Fac me tecum plangere."

The next section ("Fac, ut portem"), though marked Poco più animato, has much the same character as the immediately foregoing, till an outburst, with furious orchestral syncopations and figuration, occurs on the words "Flammis ne urar succensus." Here again the "diminished seventh," beloved of modern composers, is effectively used. At "Per te, Virgo," the original tempo resumes, and the (unison) voices move through short phrases in monotone, accompanied by rapid drum-beats and soft trumpet notes low down in the scale. At the word "judicii," the trumpets have a long peal, and the orchestra triumphantly asserts the key of G major. But the voices preserve their unison and monotone, chanting through an extended rallentando, and ending (in D major) on the word "victoriæ," which the brass salutes with a loud and majestic fanfare. The final section, "Quando corpus," opens solemnly, detached orchestral chords in F sharp minor accompanying the bass intonation of the first line. Then voices and instruments (estremamente p.) join in the following—

This noble passage is richly accompanied, harps being prominent, and at its close the orchestra continues the glowing strain. Then comes the end—in which the final orchestral phrase is that of the voices in the opening bars.

Laudi alla Vergine Maria.

This work, as already stated, is a Quartet for female voices (two sopranos and two contraltos), in the key of G major; Moderato; crotchet = 84. Though a production to which a large measure of thought and care has been given by the venerable composer, it is, in my view, not one adapted to attain great popularity. Being without accompaniment, the effect is thin, the more because Verdi has thought proper to employ much, and changeful, chromatic harmony, which renders the task of the singers difficult, and also imitative passages that, with one voice to a part, sound feeble and unsatisfactory. That there are beautiful effects in the hymn will readily be understood; the finest, perhaps, coming at the end. This may be cited as a favourable example—

The Quartet was encored at its Paris performance, but obviously by way of compliment to the ladies—Mesdames Ackté, Grandjean, Heglon, and Delna—who sang it.

Te Deum.

The last, and, as will generally be considered, the greatest of the three works, begins with the "intonation" proper to the Hymn in the ancient ritual—

It is stated by the basses in the first of the two choirs here employed, and echoed, in A minor, by the tenors of the same body. This is not an exordium and nothing else. The archaic phrase forms the central thought of the work, and is treated later with much ingenuity and effect. Following it, the male voices of both choirs have antiphonal passages (unaccompanied), chiefly in repeated chords, which are seldom changed. The composer's purpose in this subdued and bare effect is to throw into high relief a loud ensemble at the Sanctus, upon which all voices and instruments are brought to bear. Continuing, the first choir deals with a brief theme—of much importance, since it repeatedly returns as the work goes on. In the course of this, the second choir continues the exclamation "Sanctus," both choirs joining in a climax of immense power, ending on the second inversion of the chord of G flat. All this is artfully contrived for contrast. With hushed voices, both choirs (soprani tacent) repeat the "Sanctus" in the key just named, the sopranos entering on the final chord as softly as possible (morendo), and, following them, the harmonics of the violins sustaining with ethereal effect.

There is now a brief orchestral interlude, presenting a new phrase—of great importance. At present it appears between phrases for separate vocal parts—

Soon, however, it is extended by repetition of the principal figure, and passes to the voices, which deal with it very effectively in a polyphonic ensemble closing in G flat; that key still prevailing. The same phrase is continued after a jubilant passage wholly in D flat, and carries on the argument to the end of "Sanctum quoque Paraclitum Spiritum." The key of G flat here makes way for that of B flat, and again we have the Liturgial intonation, now pompously announced by the brass—and taken up by the choirs, in unison, with all possible force. At "Tu ad liberandum suscepturus hominem" the composer sets himself to regular development of the ritual subject, in eight real parts; carrying it on with amazing spirit and stimulating effect, to a full close in the key last-named. Passing on, he reverts to the interludial phrase already dealt with, and treats it anew in the orchestra, while the voices have independent phrases. The setting of "Salvum fac populum tuum" consists of massive choral harmonies, without accompaniment, after which the orchestra presents the theme, "Pleni sunt coeli," and that heretofore described as interludial, successively—

This combination is finally worked out by both choirs as one body. There is an equally effective, though very different device for "Dignare, Domine, in die isto"; the unisonous voices, supported by instruments, singing—while the orchestral basses slowly pulsate on F sharp below them. A notable antiphonal effect is secured by simple means on "Miserere nostri, Domine," and thence to the end the work proceeds regularly. The setting of "In te speravi" shows Verdi still unexhausted. Here he employs a soprano solo, in three short phrases, apparently to individualise the prayer, and so comes to an end.

The performance in Paris need not long detain us. While the orchestra was irreproachable, the chorus could not possibly satisfy English ears. It lacked volume and quality of tone—a defect not made up for by accuracy and finesse. The singing of the Quartet was spoiled by a vibrato which threw everything out of tune. "All Paris" listened decorously; indulged in some chaste applause, and went home, no doubt, with the complacency warranted by an act of penance. M. Taffanel conducted, and had his forces thoroughly in hand.

GOOD FRIDAY CONCERTS.

The Royal Choral Society.

The largest audience at the many concerts which took place on Good Friday, the 8th ult, assembled in the evening at the Albert Hall, where the Royal Choral Society, under the conductorship of Sir Frederick Bridge, gave its usual shortened version of Handel's "Messiah." The occasion is one that scarcely calls for detailed criticism. The soloists were Miss Esther Palliser, Miss Clara Butt, Mr. Lloyd Chandos, and Mr. Santley, all of whom discharged their familiar tasks with artistic earnestness and ability. The numbers "He shall feed His flock" and "Come unto Him" have seldom been rendered with greater purity and fervency of expression, and Mr. Santley sang with a command of vocal art that more than once excited the enthusiasm of his listeners.

Queen's Hall Choral Society.

So meritorious was the rendering, on the 8th ult. (Good Friday), of the majority of the choruses in "The Redemption" as to again evoke regret that this capable body of vocalists has not more frequently been heard of late. The dramatic elements of Gounod's expressive trilogy, which has become such a favourite work for performance in religious seasons, were adequately brought out, the scene in the Sanhedrim in this respect proving more than ordinarily effective, whilst the fresh voices of Mr. Stedman's choir of boys in the organ gallery told exceedingly well in the imposing Ascension chorus "Unfold, ye portals," this section having rarely been executed with such precision, dignity, and emphasis. At this point Mr. Henry J. Wood had reason to be proud of both the choral and the instrumental force he so firmly directed. Miss Helen Jaxon sang the principal soprano passages with the requisite feeling and impulse, missing none of her opportunities. Miss Ada Crossley sympathetically rendered Mary's beautiful solo at the foot of the Cross, and Miss Alice M. Toothill showed praiseworthy care as the assistant-soprano. The music of the Saviour was delivered by Mr. Louis Frolich in a painstaking manner, and Messrs. Herbert Grover and Orme Darvall represented the Narrators zealously. Mr. Percy Pitt was at the organ. The reception of "The Redemption" was throughout as hearty as its warmest admirers could desire.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

The second concert of the present season of the Philharmonic Society took place on March 31, at the Queen's Hall, and was probably made most memorable to the majority of the audience by the fiery playing of M. Ossif Gabrilowitsch in Liszt's Pianoforte Concerto in E flat. It will perhaps be remembered that this young pianist elicited very favourable criticisms on his first appearance in England last summer at a Richter concert, and he certainly justified them by his performance on this occasion. The work was attacked with all the élan of a charge of French cavalry, and although now and again the reading was deficient in restraint, its brilliancy and exuberance made it pulse stirring, and five recalls to the platform and the positive insistence of an extra piece testified to its effectiveness. M. Gabrilowitsch may indeed be placed under the head of "Pianists arranged by Liszt." Mr. Henry Such, the violinist, has a delicate and refined style, and executes rapid passages in a neat and estimable manner. He woos rather than commands attention, a method of appeal by no means to be despised. He chose Raff's Concerto in B minor, in the production of which Herr Wilhelmj had much to do. Considering that the work had not previously been heard at these concerts, one expected an analysis of it in the programme book; but presumably the shilling charged would not cover the expense, and a mere announcement of the work was all that was to be found. The expected information was, however, forthcoming concerning the other novelty at these concerts, Saint-Saëns's picturesque and wonderfully scored symphonic poem "Phæton," which was made to serve as the overture to the evening. It was well rendered, but the most important and best orchestral performance was that of Mozart's familiar Symphony in E flat, the first of the three masterpieces in this form dating from 1788. At the end of the first half of the programme, Sir Alexander Mackenzie relinquished the baton to Dr. Hubert Parry, who conducted his enjoyable and characteristic "Symphonic Variations," which were "repeated by request." Miss Susan Strong being unable to appear, owing to a cold, the vocal element was supplied by Madame Alva, who sang with great beauty of voice and dramatic power "Ritorna vincitor," from Verdi's "Aïda," and "L'altra notte," from Boïto's "Mefistofele."

THE BACH CHOIR.

A Society like the Bach Choir, whose motto has ever been Res severa verum gaudium, could scarcely have expected such large numbers of the general public as were attracted by the concert given on the 2nd ult., at the Queen's Hall, In Memoriam of Johannes Brahms. The programme was pre-eminently a musicians' programme, for it consisted of three of the great master's most solid and most serious works, in which splendid musicianship must occasionally compensate for a certain lack of melodic inspiration and what is generally called charm, the very qualities, that is, which most appeal to non-musicians. It says much for the esteem in which Brahms's music is held that such works as the ode to the goddess of funerals, "Nänie" (Op. 82), the second Pianoforte Concerto in B flat (Op. 83), and the "German Requiem" should have almost filled the large Queen's Hall. True, the wonderful "Requiem" has long taken its place by the side of the most sublime revelations in music. From this proud position no cavilling at its "austerity" and "dulness" can oust it, nor can adverse criticism detract from the "true joy" with which its inspired strains fill those to whom this "Requiem" seems a crushing effort of genius, and one of the very few works of modern times worthy to be named with the choral masterpieces of the greatest of the great masters. But it is to such as mourn and are sorrowful that Brahms's music, itself the outpouring of a mournful heart, appeals most strongly, and speaks as with the voice of peace and consolation. Under the soothing influence of that most touching soprano solo, "Ye now are sorrowful," the heart seems to open as a clenched fist opens for a friendly grasp. There seems to be nothing in all music quite like this wonderful movement. The "Requiem" is still a terra incognita to many who can enjoy the composer's chamber and orchestral music. We can wish them nothing better than a speedy recognition of its greatness and beauty. The performance, on the 12th ult., was, on the whole, excellent. The choir sang with the ease and surety that come of thorough familiarity with a difficult task, nor were they lacking in vigour in the dramatic choruses, though a resonant tone and abandon are not generally the strongest points of the Bach Choir. Miss Alice Esty and Mr. Francis Harford were the soloists. The former sang the lovely soprano solo with just the simplicity and Innigkeit the music demands. She completely merged the singer in the music; moreover, with the exception of one note, she sang in perfect tune, no mean achievement, as those who know the piece will allow. Mr. Harford hardly suggested the awe and mystery of the terribly earnest and uncompromising bass solos. He was frankly "dramatic," which is exactly what is not wanted in this stern music. Professor Stanford's reading of the work was full of breadth and dignity. "Nänie," one of Brahms's least spontaneous works, though full of a severe, calm beauty of its own, was also well sung; and Mr. Leonard Borwick gave a quite superb performance of the great Second Concerto. His playing was remarkable for brilliancy and power, combined with a rare intellectual insight amounting to a perfect exploration of a little known and shamefully neglected work. He proved by his performance, no less than by his quite remarkable success, that this is one of the concertos which must be played either by a great artist in his grandest style or not at all. We shall be surprised if, after the furore created by Mr. Borwick with "Brahms in B flat," other great pianists fail to suddenly "discover" a masterpiece.

LAMOUREUX CONCERTS.

THE result of the plébescite submitted by Mr. Robert Newman for the Lamoureux concert at the Queen's Hall, on the 20th ult., was a programme containing Beethoven's "Egmont" Overture, Tschaïkowsky's Sixth Symphony, Saint-Saëns's "Danse Macabre," the Larghetto from Dvorák's Serenade in E (Op. 22), and the everlasting "Ride of the Valkyries." To these Mr. Newman added a novelty in the shape of a Pianoforte Concerto in F minor (No. 2) by M. Théodore Dubois, which had not previously been performed in England. The work, which was originally produced on January 30 last at a Paris Conservatoire concert, consists of four distinct movements. The first of these possesses considerable musical charm, its themes being expressive and graceful, and treated in a picturesque manner. The next number is headed Adagio con sentimento profondissimo, and although the sentiment cannot be said to reach the depths of "profondissimo," it is genuine and poetical, and therefore is quite as acceptable. The Scherzo has the spirit which lurks in Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music, and the robust and masculine character of the Finale provides effective contrast to what has gone before and forms a brilliant conclusion. The solo portion, which is very grateful to the player, was excellently rendered by Mdlle. Clotilde Kleeberg, who was the executant on the initial performance, and to whose crisp touch and vivacious style the music is peculiarly in accord. M. Lamoureux's reading of Tschaïkowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony was noticed at length in last month's number of THE MUSICAL TIMES, and it is, therefore, only necessary to say that on this occasion the interpretation of the second movement was decidedly better than before, more attention being paid to expression and accentuation of its grace. Many of the details of the orchestration were audible with remarkable clearness, and in its entirety the performance was worthy of the work and its conductor's fame. It is almost unnecessary to say that an ideal rendering was given of Saint-Saëns's grotesque symphonic poem "Le Danse Macabre," but the reading of Beethoven's Overture to Goethe's drama "Egmont" was less satisfactory. It was deficient in dignity, the opening of the Allegro was taken too slowly, and in expression it was wanting in masculine sentiment.

CRYSTAL PALACE CONCERTS.

THE Saturday concert of March 26 coincided with the seventy-first anniversary of Beethoven's death, and the programme was accordingly devoted exclusively to the compositions of that master. The symphony was the "Pastoral," of which Mr. Manns secured a very enjoyable rendering, and Lady Hallé was loudly and deservedly applauded after her fine performance of the Violin Concerto. The vocalist of the afternoon, Miss Marie Berg, made a successful début in Clärchen's songs from "Egmont" and an early aria entitled "Primo amore," recently issued in the supplemental volume of Beethoven's works and not previously sung in public in this country. The remaining numbers were the "Egmont" and "Fidelio" Overtures and the Romance in F for violin and orchestra, played by Lady Hallé. The miserable weather, and possibly the attractions of the University boat race, accounted for the sparse attendance.

There was no lack of variety in the programme of the concert of the 2nd ult., which included Tschaïkowsky's Pianoforte Concerto in B flat minor, Mendelssohn's "Hear my Prayer," a selection from Schubert's "Rosamunde" music, Handel's Largo in G, and the march with chorus from Wagner's "Tannhäuser." The audience, however, was again disappointingly small. M. Gabrilowitsch, who undertook the solo in the concerto, proved himself, as on the occasion of his English début in the same work at a Richter concert in 1896, an executant of remarkable brilliancy; and Madame Lucile Hill, to whom the solo in Mendelssohn's Psalm was allotted, introduced three pleasing songs by Mr. Garnet Cox, an ex-student of the Royal Academy of Music. Mr. Manns conducted throughout with his habitual energy and the choir acquitted itself with credit.

Mr. Manns was unfortunately prevented by severe indisposition from directing the concert of the 9th ult., but a very able substitute was found in Mr. F. H. Cowen. The conductor of the Hallé concerts directed excellent performances of Beethoven's Second Symphony, the Overture to Gluck's "Iphigénie en Aulide," and the dances in "Elysian Fields" from the same composer's "Orfeo." The pianist of the afternoon was Mdlle. Clotilde Kleeberg, whose brilliant technique and charm of expression secured her a great success in Chopin's F minor Concerto. Miss Rosa Green gave a familiar air from Saint-Saëns's "Samson et Dalila" with moderate success, and M. Jacques Renard, the principal violoncellist of the Crystal Palace Band, played a characteristic Arabian dance by his brother, M. Jean Renard, with considerable skill.

Miss Leonora Jackson, the accomplished young American violinist, who had already been heard at the Queen's Hall concerts and at the Salle Erard, made her début at Sydenham on the 16th ult. with signal success, choosing for her principal solo Bach's Concerto for violin, strings, and clavier, an extremely interesting work believed to date from the Cöthen period of its composer. The solo was played in admirable style by Miss Jackson, whose enterprise in introducing what is practically a novelty in England deserves cordial recognition. Mr. Manns, happily restored to his usual health, directed excellent performances of Brahms's noble Symphony in D, the Overture to the "Flauto Magico," and Sullivan's Overture "Di Ballo." Mr. Andrew Black was the vocalist, singing Henschel's effective ballad "Jung Dieterich" and two songs by Mr. Cowen in his incisive and effective style.

ROYAL ARTILLERY BAND CONCERTS.

NOT the least satisfactory feature of the concerts at Queen's Hall by Cavaliere Zavertal's competent force is the freedom from prejudice displayed in the selection of works. The old and the new are equally well placed, and upon the interpretation of each the utmost care is bestowed. Mozart and Wagner were near neighbours on March 25, Edward German alone separating them, and the respect they received from both conductor and band was equal. The specimen of Mozart's genius was the "Jupiter" Symphony, the combined dignity, grace, and energy of which could scarcely have been developed with a higher degree of artistic effect. So accurately was the spirit of the masterpiece caught that preference with respect to the rendering of the impulsive opening Allegro, the delicious Andante, the sparkling Minuet, or the vigorous Finale resolved itself into a question of personal sentiment. Abundant character marked the execution of the "Trauermarsch" from "Götterdämmerung" and the "Walkürenritt," all the points of these picturesque compositions being clearly developed. Quite as satisfactory in every way was the performance of Mr. German's delightful Masque music, composed for the revival of "As you like it" at the St. James's Theatre last year. Such piquant pieces as the Woodland, the Children's, and the Rustic dances—replete with airy gaiety and spontaneity—are worthy companions to the deservedly popular "Henry VIII." series. They were received with a warmth of approval testifying that the audience would gladly have heard them a second time. The march from Gounod's "La Reine de Saba," Chaminade's delicate little piece "La Chaise à Porteurs," the "Danse des Prêtresses de Dagon," from Saint-Saëns's "Samson et Dalila," and the Overture to Hofmann's

"Aennchen von Tharau" were also in the programme, throughout conducted by Cavaliere Zavertal with decision and judgment.

Another concert was given on the 22nd ult., when a Symphony in D minor, by Emanuel Moór, was performed, it was stated, for the first time in England. It proved to be a work more sturdy than fanciful in character. The opening Allegro has more than ordinary vigour, to which the succeeding Andante does not yield sufficient relief; but the Scherzo—which at an initial hearing seizes attention as the most original section—is animated and of well-sustained interest. The final Allegro has a touch of barbaric force, which suffers in effect from the movement being carried to undue length. Cavaliere Zavertal took the utmost pains with the symphony, which was favourably received, though it did not evoke enthusiasm. Evidently more acceptable to the majority was Tschaïkowsky's bright "Casse-Noisette" Suite, played with engaging spirit and point. Wagner's "Huldigungs-Marsch" and the Overture to "Die Meistersinger" respectively began and concluded an agreeable programme.

MONDAY AND SATURDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

The record of the fortieth season of these entertainments may now be concluded with brevity. The first concert to demand mention is the Saturday performance of March 26, the programme being selected entirely from the music of Beethoven in commemoration of the anniversary of the master's death, which occurred on March 26, 1827. The works rendered were the Quartet in C minor (Op. 18, No. 4), the more mature Quintet in C (Op. 29), and the abstruse Quartet in A minor (Op. 132). Four of the Lieder were sung to perfection by Mrs. Henschel.

The last Saturday performance of the season, on the 2nd ult., showed the Joachim Berlin Quartet to the fullest advantage, beginning as it did with Beethoven's unsurpassable Quartet in C (Op. 59, No. 3) and ending with Professor Villiers Stanford's masterly Quartet in D minor (Op. 64). The vocalist was Madame Blanche Marchesi, who imparted the utmost significance to songs by various composers.

Brahms was the master who was specially honoured at the closing concert on the 4th ult., for the date was as nearly as possible in accordance with the anniversary of the composer's death. The Joachim artists performed the somewhat intricate Quartet in C minor (Op. 51, No. 1), the Quintet in G (Op. 111), and the Sextet in B flat (Op. 18). All were splendidly rendered by the Joachim Quartet party, with the assistance of other well-qualified artists. Dr. Joachim received a fervent greeting when he came forward to play three of the Hungarian Dances, and the audience would gladly have heard more, but the violinist was firm in his refusal to grant an encore. Madame Blanche Marchesi sang three of Brahms's Lieder to perfection.

WALENN CHAMBER CONCERTS.

Messrs. Walenn judiciously impart distinction to their chamber concerts by the production of new or little-known works, and at their performance on March 29, at the Queen's (Small) Hall, they claimed the introduction to England of a Trio in D minor (Op. 3) by Alexander Zemlinsky. Of the writings of this young composer little is known in this country, and the trio does not excite great desire for further acquaintance with his works. It is laid out for pianoforte, clarinet or violin, and violoncello, and the first of the three movements indicates clever craftsmanship and earnest endeavour to secure effective expression. The themes, moreover, are tersely developed, and although the other numbers are not so good, the composition in its entirety may be said to be one of promise. Another work, probably new to the large majority of the audience, was a song cycle, entitled "The Passing Year," by Mr. Rutland Boughton. The cycle consists of twelve lyrics, severally dealing with each month of the year, written by Lizzie Miller Pengelly, the sentiment of whose unpretentious lines is in some instances happily accentuated by the music, especially that of a meditative character. Justice was done to the cycle by Mr. Arthur Walenn, who was accompanied by the composer. Miss Hettie West made her "first appearance in London." Some vocalists come to the metropolis too late, but Miss West has come too soon, and she has yet much to learn in her art. The programme also contained Dvorák's pleasing "Bagatellen" for two violins, violoncello, and pianoforte. The instrumentalists were Miss Maude Rihll, Miss Dorothea Walenn, Mr. Gerald and Mr. Herbert Walenn, and Mr. George Clutsam.

AMATEUR ORCHESTRAL CONCERTS.

Distinction was given to the orchestral concert at the Imperial Institute, on March 30, by the first performance in England of a Concertstück for four horns and orchestra, by Heinrich Hübler, who for some years was first horn-player at the Dresden Opera House. The work was written in 1856, and therefore it is not surprising that in form and in scoring it is somewhat old-fashioned; but the horn parts are written with such sympathy with the genius of these instruments that the piece possesses considerable musical interest. It is in three sections, which, however, were played without break. The two first numbers are of a dignified and expressive nature, and are decidedly the best portions of the work. The concluding movement, in six-eight measure, suggests a hunting song and is somewhat commonplace. The horns were excellently played by Messrs. A. Borsdorf, J. Smith, T. R. Busby, and E. Livsey, who were well supported by the orchestra. Meritorious renderings were also given of Tschaïkowsky's fascinating "Nut-cracker" Suite, Weber's Overture to "Der Freischütz," and Moszkowski's "Spanish Dances." Mr. Rennison-Hudson played a Fantasia in C, by Paggi, for the flute with great brilliancy, and some songs were tastefully sung by Miss Gordon-Scott. Mr. Louis d'Egville conducted in the absence of Mr. Randegger.

The concert given on the 5th ult., by the Stock Exchange Orchestral and Choral Society, at the Queen's Hall, further exemplified Mr. Arthur W. Payne's decided abilities as a conductor. An excellent interpretation was given of Mozart's Symphony in G minor (the second of the famous three which concluded his compositions in this form), and admirable performances were secured of Mendelssohn's Overture to "Athalie," Sir Alexander Mackenzie's orchestral arrangement of his beautiful "Benedictus," and Sir Arthur Sullivan's "In emMoriam" Overture. As usual, the singing of the male-voice choir, under the direction of Mr. Alfred E. Cooke, was a much appreciated feature. The glees selected were "When for the world's repose" (Mornington) and "The mighty conqueror" (Webbe), and the part-songs were "The Sailor's Song" (Hatton), "Northman's Song" (Kücken), and "The Cryer" (King Hall). The rendering, by Mdlle. Eva Cortesi, of Massenet's "Air de Ximène," from "Le Cid," and the same composer's "Pensée d'Automne," no less than the finished playing by Mr. W. H. Squire of several violoncello pieces, contributed in no small degree to the enjoyment of the evening.

"THE LEGEND OF ST. DAVID."

Some particular interest was attached to the performance, on the 4th ult., at the Queen's Hall, of the oratorio entitled "The Legend of St. David," by Mr. D. Jenkins, for this composer is one of the most popular writers in Wales, and consequently his music may be taken as indicative of widespread taste in the art in the principality. The oratorio is not new. The score bears the date of December 1, 1893, and the work was first performed at the National Eisteddfod, Carnarvon, of the following year; but it had not been heard in London until last month, and consequently had not been submitted to the fierce scrutiny of metropolitan criticism. "St. David" contains several masterly numbers, especially the choruses, and its pages are marked by a sincerity of expression and a certain deftness in the use of effective devices that frequently excite respect and admiration. To a Londoner the libretto contains too many incidents, which result in the score comprising forty-two numbers and extending over 226 pages. Gallant Wales, however, presumably likes its oratorios long, as once did London. Mr. H. W. Hughes, the librettist, has cast his work in dramatic form, and has divided it into four scenes. In the first is related David's election as a missionary leader. In the second is told the temptation of himself and his brethren by Satrapa and her maidens in a manner which carries the mind to Klingsor's Garden in Wagner's "Parsifal." The third scene is occupied with the celebration in which David is made an Archbishop, and the work is concluded with the welcoming of David to his cathedral, and his death. The composer is at his best in the choral portions, and specially when his harmonic scheme is diatonic. Happy use is made of an old Welsh melody suggestive of the ancient Greek Phrygian mode, and the choruses of the Disciples, for tenors and basses, form a conspicuous feature of the work. Much appreciation of effect is shown in the second scene, where the chorus of Satrapa's maidens, "Trip we gaily," is cleverly contrasted by the unceremonious ejaculations of the Disciples, "Go, sirens, go, seek your den," and in the vigorous conclusion of the scene, in which is recounted the destruction of Satrapa. A good choral climax closes the third section, and the Finale of the oratorio is well conceived. The solos are less distinctive. David has some melodious tenor airs, Satrapa is provided with dramatic passages, the bass solos of Paulinus possess dignity, and the song of Boia, the sorcerer, has vigour. An expressive contralto song is also sung by Dunawd, Satrapa's daughter, somewhat needlessly introduced, and promptly murdered by her mother. There are in addition solo passages for the Angel, the Dove, and three bishops, all the last-named being tenors. The chief vocalists on the 4th ult. were Miss Maggie Davies, Miss Morfydd Williams, Mr. Ben Davies, Mr. William Davies, and Mr. David Hughes, all of whom sang with the zeal associated with their nationality. The choruses were rendered by the Pontypool and Abersychan choir, winners of the first prize in the chief choral competition at the Newport National Eisteddfod. The voices were fresh and resonant, those of the tenors and basses being particularly good. Precision and dramatic perception characterised their singing and reflected much credit on their trainer, Mr. Walter Protheroe, and there was a notable earnestness about all they did which held the attention of the listeners. The orchestra was efficient, and good service was rendered by Mr. Treharne at the organ. Mr. D. Jenkins conducted.

THE "DREAM OF JUBAL" AT HACKNEY.

No more intelligent or persevering body of youthful amateurs is to be found in the metropolis and its suburbs than the boys of the Grocers' Company's School at Hackney Downs, who are under the musical guidance of Mr. Ernest Newton. To their conscientious treatment of standard choral works reference has frequently been made; but on the 2nd ult. they surpassed all preceding attempts by an able performance of the "Dream of Jubal." Before the lads had completed the first portion of their labours it was evident that the advantages of watchful training were supplemented by strong liking for one of the most masterly of Sir A. C. Mackenzie's productions. Their hearts being in their work they sang with force and intention, though this well-directed earnestness was always under control. The result speaks volumes for the artistic feeling animating these trebles and altos, as well as for the patience of their instructor. The members of several better known associations might with benefit both to themselves and to their hearers copy the painstaking attributes of the Grocers' Company's boys. Welcome at all times, the "Dream of Jubal" was, under the circumstances, doubly acceptable. The entire rendering was as creditable to the executants as the choice of the work was to the judgment and progressive spirit of the governing body of the School. With an efficient party of tenors and basses, and the orchestra, the performers totalled about 200. Masters E. M. Penn, C. Eade, F. W. Challis, and Messrs. Henry Beaumont (encored in the "Song of the Sickle") and D. M. Miller took the solos, and Mr. Joseph Bennett's poem was effectively read by the Rev. C. G. Gull. Mendelssohn's "Capriccio Brillante" for pianoforte and orchestra—the solo part neatly played by Mr. Frank Pickford—preceded the cantata.

VARIOUS RECITALS.

On Saturday afternoon, the 2nd ult., the Salle Erard, in Great Marlborough Street, was re-opened as a public concert-room, the chief feature of the inauguration being the excellent pianoforte playing of Mr. Paderewski. Miss Evangeline Florence, Miss Leonora Jackson, Miss Clara Butt, and Mr. Ben Davies took part with much success in the programme. The Salle Erard is excellently adapted for concerts and recitals, and will surely be well patronised.

Madame Frickenhaus offered an exceedingly interesting chamber concert on the evening of March 25, at St. James's Hall. English music was strongly in evidence, for it must be remembered that, notwithstanding the concert-giver's Continental married name, Madame Frickenhaus is an Englishwoman by birth, being known as Miss Nancy Evans before her marriage. With rare patriotism Madame Frickenhaus gave prominence to what may be termed minor works by British-born composers, including three movements from a Suite by Mr. E. A. MacDowell (Op. 14) and two trifles by Mr. Dal Young. Mr. W. E. Whitehouse was subsequently associated with Mrs. Norman Salmond in Chopin's Introduction and Polonaise in C (Op. 3) for pianoforte and violoncello. Mr. H. Gregory Hast rendered songs by Franz Ries and Rubinstein with considerable charm. Madame Frickenhaus played throughout with intelligence and almost perfect technique.

The second and last of Mr. and Mrs. Henschel's vocal recitals took place at St. James's Hall, on Wednesday, March 30, and was very well attended. These performances always deserve record, because, apart from the merit of the execution, the programmes have invariably an educational tendency, conventional songs and duets being for the most part avoided. Antiquarian music was adequately represented by songs emanating from J. W. Franck, Handel, Cimarosa, Salvator Rosa, Paisiello, and Arne. More interesting, perhaps, to the majority of the audience were the songs by Schubert, Liszt, Davidoff, Loewe, and Mr. Henschel which followed. All were well selected and sung with the purity of style which always characterises the efforts of Mr. and Mrs. Henschel.

Mr. Moritz Rosenthal having recovered from the injury to a finger, which for a time incapacitated him from playing, gave his first pianoforte recital in London this season on Monday afternoon, March 28. The richly endowed German artist showed no traces whatever of indisposition, and of course his opening number—Mozart's Sonata in A, ending with the Turkish March, was mere child's play to him. So it seemed was Chopin's Sonata in B flat minor (Op. 35), with the Funeral March, and some minor compositions by the Polish master, including the Waltz in D flat, which was given as a contrapuntal study—that is to say, with an independent new part for the left hand. It is deftly written and, being duly acknowledged, may pass without disapproval. At the second recital, on the 4th ult., Mr. Rosenthal gave a delightful reading of Beethoven's Sonata in E flat (Op. 81), "Les adieux, l'absence, et le retour"; but his greatest success was won at the third and last recital for this year, which took place on the 16th ult. It commenced with Beethoven's Sonata in E (Op. 109), which was delivered with all requisite expression, though more individuality and true significance of style were displayed in Schumann's "Etudes Symphoniques" (Op. 13), of which a finer interpretation could scarcely be imagined, either in manipulation or feeling.

Mr. F. H. Cowen has been termed, not unhappily, the English Schubert in the matter of song-writing, and he certainly pens graceful and charming lyrics in profusion. Over thirty of these were presented at his Song Recital, in St. James's Hall, on the 1st ult., and some which were given for the first time proved that Mr. Cowen's facility has not in aught diminished. To mention every number would be impossible, and comparisons would be odious, but attention may be called to a couple of facts with reference to Mr. Cowen's songs. One is the invariable tunefulness of the voice part and the other the tastefulness without difficulty of the accompaniments. The executants at a very enjoyable concert were Miss Florence Oliver, Miss Mabel Berrey, Miss Evangeline Florence, Madame Medora Henson, Miss Clara Butt, Miss Fanny Davies, and Messrs. Edward Lloyd, Hirwen Jones, Andrew Black, and Santley.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

At the annual meeting of the directors, held on March 31, the following were elected Fellows and Associates of the Royal Academy of Music:—Fellows: W. S. Bambridge, G. E. Bambridge, Richard Cummings, Ben Davies, F. A. W. Docker, F. G. Edwards, William Nicholl, Louis N. Parker, Arthur Thompson, Amy Hare, and Hilda Wilson. Associates: N. G. Alston, Aldo Antonietti, Arthur Barlow, Thomas W. Lardner, Hubert G. Oke, Louis B. Prout, F. B. Ranalow, Arthur Walenn, Gerald Walenn, Herbert Walenn, George W. Welch, John E. West, Alice Crawley, May W. Cummings, H. Claiborne Dixon, Mary A. Howard, Gertrude Peppercorn, Beatrice Stuart, and Clara Williams.

Only brief notice is called for concerning the performances given by the students of the dramatic and operatic classes respectively, on March 25 and 26, at the Royal Academy of Music. On the first-mentioned date the pieces chosen were Wynn Miller's "Dream Faces" and Augustus Harris's three-act comedy, "The Little Treasure," in which works Dorothea Corder, Annie M. Child, Helen Macdonald, and Janet Duff, and H. C. Rose, A. L. Soames, and Aubrey Prust sustained, with much intelligence, the characters respectively entrusted to them, the last-named showing marked dramatic ability.

The following evening a shortened version was given of Auber's opera "Fra Diavolo," in which the chief characters were embodied by Alice M. Holder, Lizzie T. Davies, and Whitworth Mitton, Robert Hyett, A. Bartleet, Ford Waltham, and A. J. Hall. The choruses were brightly sung, and the dancing of the Saltarella reflected credit on Mr. B. Soutten's teaching. The orchestra as usual, owing to want of space, was represented by a pianoforte, intelligently played by Cuthbert F. Whitemore, and Mr. G. H. Betjemann conducted.

It is not often that so promising a work is heard at a students' concert as the Dramatic Overture in B minor by Garnet W. Cox, which opened the performance given by the pupils on March 28, at the Queen's Hall. The overture begins with a slow section, which at once excites attention by reason of its dignity and suggestiveness. The following Allegro has much that is in sympathy with the style of Weber, and the scoring shows decided aptitude for this difficult branch of musical art. A Fantasia in D for violin and orchestra, by the present holder of the Macfarren Scholarship, Percy Hilder Miles, by whom the solo part was well played, suffers from over-development of the thematic material; but the writing shows appreciation of what is effective on the violin and the orchestration testifies to sound tuition. Marguerite Elzy played with notable verve and ability the solo part of the first movement from Tschaïkowsky's Pianoforte Concerto in B flat minor, and Claude F. Pollard displayed neat execution in Grieg's Pianoforte Concerto in A minor. The vocalists were no less promising. Ethel M. Wood, who sang Mendelssohn's "Infelice," has already made a successful public dêbut, and Reginald Chalcraft is gifted with a voice that, combined with the good training he is manifestly receiving, should ultimately secure for him an esteemed position. The other singers were Margaret Cooper and R. Whitworth Mitton, who gave a praiseworthy rendering of the letter duet from Bizet's "Carmen." Sir Alexander Mackenzie conducted.

The following competitions have taken place since our last issue: The Sterndale Bennett Prize, on March 26, awarded to Florence Dawes (of Birmingham). The examiners highly commended Marguerite S. Elzy and commended Vera Margolies. The Louisa Hopkins Memorial Prize, on March 29, awarded to Marguerite S. Elzy (of Worcestershire). The examiners commended Marion White and Elsie E. Horne. The Charles Mortimer Prize (for composers) awarded to Charles H. W. Hickin (of London), Alfred H. Barley and Mary S. Burgess being commended.

LONDON ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

More than usual interest pertained to the operatic performance given by the students of the dramatic class of the London Academy of Music, on March 31, at St. George's Hall, owing to the work chosen being Lortzing's comic opera "Die beiden Schützen," which had not been heard previously in this country, and which was played in English under the title of "The Random Shot." The work was produced originally in 1837 and was very favourably received. At that period the story doubtless was less hackneyed in character than it now appears to be, and the incidents arising from the endeavours of two hungry soldiers to obtain a dinner, one of whom has taken by mistake a comrade's knapsack instead of his own, resulting in a confusion of identity, leads to several diverting situations. The music, although reminiscent of many masters, and for the most part commonplace, is, however, bright and gay, and the vocal concerted numbers are neatly written. It is admirably adapted for performance by students owing to the number of small parts it contains, and these were creditably sustained on this occasion by Mabel Calkin, Daisy Irvine, Alice Tristram, and R. Cooper, C. James, S. Verde, C. Earldon, and R. Hammond. Henry Gordon failing to attend, his place as the Magistrate was taken by Mr. Richard Temple, to whose excellent stage management no little of the success achieved was due. The instrumental portion was well rendered by the Student String Band, assisted by a pianoforte, and Mr. A. Pollitzer, the Principal of the Academy, conducted. At the conclusion of the opera the diplomas and medals were presented to the successful candidates of the examinations held in January last.

THE DEVELOPMENT OF MELODY AND HARMONY IN THE MIDDLE AGES.

The meeting of the Society for the Encouragement of Fine Arts, at 9, Conduit Street, on March 24, possessed special interest to musicians, the subject being "The Development of Melody and Harmony in the Music of the Middle Ages," and the lecturer—or, rather, the speaker, for the discourse was delivered extemporaneously—being Mr. Edgar F. Jacques, the writer of the articles entitled "The Evolution of Polyphony," which appeared in the August and September numbers of The Musical Times for 1895.

Mr. Jacques's remarks covered the period from the seventh to the thirteenth centuries, and, combined with the singularly attractive series of illustrations (several of which were taken from the articles just named), showed that in these ages there existed abundance of melody, much of which possessed great beauty. In the early days, Mr. Jacques said (quoting M. Gevaert), musicians were at little pains to be "original"; they for the most part utilized a stock of note-sequences that were common property (like the Rajas of the Hindostan), and contented themselves with ingeniously varying these by rhythmic and tonal artifices of various kinds. M. Gevaert, in his last great work, had analysed over a thousand of the best-known Antiphons of the Latin Church and found that the whole of them were derived from forty-seven root-themes. Several examples from the Roman Gradual, of melodies dating from the sixth and seventh centuries, were sung, and two of the earliest known secular songs—i.e., a Lament on the death of Charlemagne and a ditty describing the battle of Fontenoy—were also given. The lecturer then dealt with the earliest efforts at harmony and polyphony. At first the melody was sung by one voice or set of voices, while others sang the same tune a fourth and an octave below. Later dawned a feeling for contrast in the movement of parts; one part moved while the other stood still, and after a time contrary motion appeared. Mr. Jacques then went on to trace the progress of polyphony, on the lines indicated in his articles from The Musical Times already referred to, and further drew attention to the family likeness existing between many beautiful melodies in the Roman Gradual (notably the Allelujahs) and certain typical phrases of European folk-song in the Middle Ages. Mr. John Thomas, who was in the chair, made some interesting remarks on ancient Welsh music, and warmly eulogized the views put forward by the lecturer. A special meed of praise is due to the vocalists—Miss Ethel Wood, Miss Waldron, Mr. Bagnal, and Mr. Haigh Jackson—all students at the Royal Academy of Music, who discharged their often difficult tasks with notable intelligence and ability.

MUSICAL ASSOCIATION.

THE EVOLUTION OF FUGUE.

Mr. J. S. Shedlock's paper on the "Evolution of Fugue," read before the Musical Association on the 5th ult., fully sustained his reputation as a musician thoroughly conversant with the development of his art. In answer to the possible question Cui bono? for taking up the subject, Mr. Shedlock opened his discourse by observing that in order fully to appreciate the works of a great composer it was necessary to have at least some knowledge of the compositions of previous writers, and the greater state of advance of those works the more worthy of admiration were those men who had not only assimilated the best of all that had been produced, but who had risen to a higher eminence.

The predecessors of J. S. Bach were as important in the history of the development of fugue as Haydn and Mozart were in that of the symphony. In the early days of instrumental music, composers wrote Ricercari and Canzoni alla francese, which were the true ancestors of modern fugue. It should be remembered that the term fugue was originally used for a canon. Then there were Fantasias in which what would now be called fugal writing abounded. Prætorius spoke of them as pieces in which composers worked out, at their own good will and pleasure, a fugue, passing on, just as the fancy took them, to another fugue. In the Ricercari, composers treated one subject after another, pretty much as in the Fantasia. The result was a lack of unity, for the opening theme, once treated, vanished, like the dove from Noah's ark, which never returned. Some remarkable exceptions, however, might be found in the "Tabulaturbuch" of Arnold Schlick (1512) and in the Ricercari of Jacob Buus (1547). Buus and Adrian Willaert were both born in the Netherlands. Willaert became Maëstro of St. Mark's in 1527 and Buus second organist of that church in 1541; in 1553, however, the latter went to Vienna, where for eleven years he was court organist. Other men who carried on the work were Andrea Gabrieli, who published Canzoni alla francese in 1571, and his nephew, Giovanni Gabrieli, of whom Ricercari were published in 1593 — both important assistants in the evolution of instrumental music—and J. P. Sweelinck.

In 1607 there appeared the "Tabulaturbuch" of Bernhard Schmid, the younger, who succeeded his father as organist of Strasburg Cathedral in 1592. This "Tabulaturbuch" comprised preludes, toccatas, and fugues, and other pieces by various composers. Schmid said that the Italians gave the name of Canzoni alla francese to fugues. Schmid's collection contained a fugue in three sections by G. Brignoli, born about 1550. The first section contained exposition and counter-exposition; the voices, four in number, entered in regular dominant and tonic order; there was a regular counter-subject, which at the last entry in the counter-exposition was inverted in double counterpoint at the distance of the twelfth. The answer to the theme was real, not tonal. In the middle section, not in different measure as in Ricercari and Canzoni, two themes distantly related to the principal theme were treated fugally. The third section was practically a repetition of the first. The style of the piece was somewhat Handelian in character.

Johann Woltz, organist of Heilbronn, published a "Tabulaturbuch" in 1617, in which an advance in form was noticeable. It contained a fugue by Simon Lohet, organist at Stuttgart about 1600. This was not in sections, but was a continuous piece, and occupied with the working of the theme, which Bach had taken for his Fugue in E (No. 9) in the second part of the "Wohltemperirte Clavier." Lohet had treated the subject in stretto, diminution, and other now familiar devices, the piece in its entirety possessing breadth and dignity. Schmid's book also contained a Fuga suavissima, by Carl Luython, organist and composer to the Emperor Rudolph II., at Prague. Up to Luython's time repercussions of themes were almost without exception in the same degrees as the opening ones, but in the Fuga suavissima, which opened in the Mixolydian mode, were used the keys of F, C, G, D, and A.

In the year 1608 Frescobaldi published his "Fantaisie a quattro," and in 1615 his "Ricercari" and "Canzoni francese." His grand style, powerful harmonies, and contrapuntal skill mark him out as the greatest of Bach's early predecessors. His influence over Bach was strong, but it was the influence of one genius over another. Like his great successor, he summed up the past and pointed to the future. There were three features in Frescobaldi's music in which advance was distinctly shown—the chromatic progressions, episodes, and continuity—all of which must have appealed strongly to Bach. The intention was more definite, the workmanship of a far higher order. With Frescobaldi, as with Bach, his intellectual powers ministered to his genius.

Johann Klemme published in 1631, at Dresden, thirty-six fugues in two, three, and four parts. Klemme was born about 1593 and became a distinguished organist. The specialty of Klemme's fugues was their form, or what might almost be termed their formality. There was a German solidity about them, a stateliness and a healthy life and vigour which rendered them landmarks of interest and importance.

Froberger was specially known by his suites, but he also wrote fugues. It was noteworthy that in fugues of Lohet, Froberger, and Bach on the same theme, the latter appeared in diminution.

More than ordinary interest attached to the fugues of Johann Pachelbel, who was born at Nuremberg in 1653 and died in that city in 1706; he was the immediate predecessor of Bach and, moreover, the teacher of Johann Christian Bach, the brother of Johann Sebastian. Pachelbel wrote a large number of fugues, in which it was easy to distinguish the germs of the rich figuration and harmonic progressions of Bach.

Dietrich Buxtehude, who perhaps exercised the strongest influence over Bach, lived from 1668 to 1707, and for thirty years was organist at Lübeck. His music was remarkable for dignity and, at times, solemnity. The scheme of his principal fugues was different from those of Bach. Buxtehude wrote fugues in sections, and in each the subject was metamorphosed. Buxtehude was preceded at the Marienkirche at Lübeck by Tunder, whose daughter he married, and doubtless came into possession of the MSS. of her father. This was an interesting point, for Tunder is said to foreshadow Buxtehude, as Buxtehude in turn foreshadowed Bach. On Buxtehude's retirement, Handel and Mattheson, by the way, went to Lübeck in 1703 as candidates for the organistship; but on learning that the successful competitor would be expected to marry Buxtehude's daughter, they retired.

In conclusion, the lecturer quoted the following passages from Dr. Hubert Parry's "Art of Music": "It ought not to be overlooked, moreover, that his (i.e., Bach's) predecessors in the line of organ music were an exceptionally high-spirited group of composers. It is difficult to find a finer or more true-hearted set of men in the whole range of the art than such as Frescobaldi, Froberger, Sweelinck, Kerl, Reinken, Buxtehude, Pachelbel, Kuhnau, John Michael Bach, and many others of the same calling and similar musical powers. . . . For though their work never reaches the pitch of equal mastery which satisfies the fastidious judgment of those who have enjoyed maturer things, it was only through their devoted pioneering that the musical revelation of the personality of Bach in instrumental music became possible."

The interest of the lecture was much enhanced by the lecturer's musical illustrations, which comprised several fugues in their entirety. Some pertinent remarks were subsequently made by the chairman, Mr. Clifford B. Edgar, Dr. Maclean, and Mr. Southgate.

BOURNEMOUTH MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

This year's Bournemouth Musical Festival, which commenced on the 21st ult., differed from its predecessors inasmuch as it extended over two days and included four concerts, each with a separate and distinct programme. The arrangements and preparations were on the usual scale of magnitude. The municipal orchestra, over which Mr. Dan Godfrey, junr., presides, was considerably augmented for the occasion in both the string and wind sections. The local chorus, numbering about 250 voices, was strengthened by a contingent of tenors from a neighbouring county. As principal vocalists, the committee had engaged Miss Esther Palliser, Miss Giulia Ravogli, Madame Cecil Newling, Mr. William Green, Mr. Watkin Mills, and Mr. Bantock Pierpoint. Mr. Charles Fletcher was solo violinist, Mr. H. Holloway, organist, and Mr. Dan Godfrey, junr., Mr. A. W. Russe, Mr. Duncan Hume, and Mr. George, conductors.

The Festival opened with Mr. Edward German's Suite in D minor, generally known as the "Leeds" Suite, in which the orchestra was heard to great advantage. The strings developed astonishing power without sacrificing fineness of tone, and the wind instruments distinguished themselves by their beautiful quality. Especially well played, despite one small slip, was the Prelude, a grand movement in the form and spirit of a first Allegro; but the most cordial reception was reserved for the Valse, which delighted the audience with its graceful melody and clearly-defined rhythm. Mr. German conducted his own work. The suite was followed by "The Golden Legend," conducted by Mr. Godfrey. Here the chorus gave evidence of its sterling quality. The ensemble, particularly in the Epilogue "God sent His messenger," was admirable, and the Evening Hymn, notwithstanding a slight fall in pitch, was very effectively sung. To the tenors and basses in particular nothing but praise can be given. The principal vocalists—Miss Esther Palliser, Miss Giulia Ravogli, Mr. William Green, Mr. Watkin Mills, and Mr. E. Howard May—took full advantage of the many opportunities to be found in Sir Arthur Sullivan's music. To Mr. Green, a new-comer to Bournemouth, a special word of congratulation is due. The possessor of a beautiful voice, he sang like a true artist, and proved himself worthy to take a prominent place in the limited ranks of festival tenors.

There was a good attendance at the first evening concert, which was devoted to "Elijah." It goes without saying that the choir revelled in the sonorous strains of the Baal choruses, and of "Be not afraid" and "And then shall the light" in the second part of the oratorio. Here, even more than in "The Golden Legend," the voices had full play, and Mr. Russe, who conducted, succeeded in firing his forces with something of his own enthusiasm. The treatment of that wonderful piece of choral writing, "Behold, God the Lord passed by," was wanting in dramatic force; but nothing could have been better than the delicate rendering of "He watching over Israel." The solo artists were Madame Cecil Newling, Miss Pauline Wood, Miss Giulia Ravogli, Mr. William Green, Mr. Gerald Lee, and Mr. Bantock Pierpoint, assisted in the double quartet by Miss Lilian Vernon and Mr. Howard May. Miss Ravogli made the customary effect in "O, rest in the Lord," which was loudly encored, but not repeated.

The third concert, on Friday afternoon, was miscellaneous, and included Schubert's "Song of Miriam," conducted by Mr. Arthur George, with Madame Newling as soloist; Max Bruch's "Fantaisie Ecossaise" for violin and orchestra; Wagner's "Rienzi" Overture; and a new Overture Symphonique, by a local composer, Mr. T. A. Burton.

Mr. Burton's Overture Symphonique, the only novelty of the festival, although scarcely "symphonic" in character, is a serious work of more than ordinary interest. The composer's themes are well presented and gracefully coloured by orchestral device, the utilisation of well-marked subjects (notably the Sicilian Mariners' Hymn) rather than the introduction of superabundant ideas being the principle upon which Mr. Burton has worked. With the exception of Schubert's "Song of Miriam" and two madrigals, sung under the direction of Mr. Arthur George, Mr. Dan Godfrey, junr., conducted this concert. And here the opportunity occurs to say how greatly the success of the festival was due to this gentleman and his fine orchestra. It is safe to assert that in a musical sense Bournemouth owes a great deal to Mr. Godfrey, who has done much to educate its inhabitants.

The Festival concluded on Friday evening with a performance of "The Messiah," conducted by Mr. Duncan Hume. The soloists were Miss Esther Palliser, Miss Giulia Ravogli, Mr. William Green, and Mr. Watkin Mills. If it be true that "All's well that ends well," all is indeed well with the Bournemouth Musical Festival of 1898.

STRATFORD MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

From a small beginning in 1883 this annual gathering at the Stratford Town Hall has assumed imposing dimensions. Designed for amateurs in the East and North-East of London and in the County of Essex, its steady growth has corresponded with the increase of musical taste in the suburbs. Four days were devoted to the competitions, and afterwards, on March 31, came a concert by the winners and the distribution of prizes to the value of £175. The judges were Mr. A. Randegger (choral and solo singing), Mr. Edwin Holland (solo singing), Mr. Myles B. Foster (church and school choirs and organ), M. Emile Sauret (violin and violoncello), Mr. John Finn (flute), Messrs. Tobias Matthay and W. W. Starmer (pianoforte), and Dr. Percy Buck, the organist of Wells Cathedral (composition and theory). In the elementary girls' school choirs contest, in which the test pieces were R. G. Thompson's "Night Hymn at Sea," another piece chosen by the choir, and a two-part test in sight-singing, the first prize was awarded to the Monteith Road, Old Ford, school (conductor, Miss R. C. Jones), and the second to the Downsell Road, Stratford, school (Miss Gertrude Pringuer). There were only two entries in the church choir (mixed voices) class, and Mr. Myles B. Foster decided that the Plaistow Wesleyan choir (conductor, Mr. A. J. Maple) was superior to the Woodgrange Wesleyan (Mr. C. F. Wood), thereby reversing the judgment delivered in 1897. The test pieces were "How lovely are the messengers" ("St. Paul") and W. Lane Frost's hymn tune "The day is past, the shadows fall." The instrumental solo, like the vocal solo, contests were closely followed. Special interest was manifested in the gold medal competition for violinists who had been prize-winners in preceding years, and of the six entrants, Mr. Stephen Champ, of Stratford, proved victorious. Throughout the festival abundant evidence was afforded of the favour in which it is held in the extensive area concerned.

"MORS ET VITA" AT DÜSSELDORF.

The first complete concert performance in Germany of Gounod's sacred trilogy "Mors et Vita" took place at Düsseldorf, on Palm-Sunday, the 3rd ult. To the Gesang-Verein of the beautiful Rhenish art centre, and to that Society's able and enterprising conductor, Herr Königl-Musikdirektor C. Steinhauer, belongs the honour of introducing the French master's last great work to a German audience. The event created the greatest interest; the local press published anticipatory descriptive notices of the work, and thus whetted the musical Düsseldorfers' appetite; and on the evening of the 3rd an enthusiastic audience of over 2,000 people thronged the large Kaisersaal of the municipal Tonhalle (Tone, not Town Hall), the fine room in which the famous Lower Rhenish Musical Festivals are held every third year. The performance was excellent, especially on the part of the choirs, upon whom so much of the effect of the trilogy depends, and the orchestra, which consisted of the capital string band (increased for the occasion) of the 39th Fusiliers (conductor, Königl-Musikdirigent W. Kohn), one of the best regimental bands in the Imperial Army. Herr Steinhauer had brought his vocal forces to a high state of efficiency, so that the many important choruses were sung with all requisite fluency and clearness, as well as with appropriate dignity and impressiveness, while as regards balance and beauty of tone there was little or nothing to be desired. The soloists were Fräulein Marie Busjäger (of Bremen), Fräulein Elsa Westendorf (of Dessau), Herren Franz Litzinger and Ludwig Piechler (both of Düsseldorf). Of these the tenor, Herr Litzinger, was the hero of the hour, as, owing to the absence of the artist originally engaged, he had to sing the music literally at first sight, and did so like a thorough musician and an artist.

The Düsseldorf press is, in the main, highly appreciative and even enthusiastic, as the following extracts will show:

The Düsseldorfer Zeitung wrote: "The sacred text has rarely received an equal musical illustration; the secular mode of expression predominates on the whole, which, however, does not prevent our considering several numbers, especially amongst the quartets, very beautiful music. . . . One of the loveliest amongst the numerous and effectively treated ensembles is the melodious 'Ingemisco' with its flowing vocal phrases. This is a most captivating movement, and under any circumstances would be considered a beautifully finished piece, even if performed by itself and without the sacred text."

The General Anzeiger wrote: "The music is far removed from what we understand by sacred music, but the work is musically effective, and a thankful task for soli, choir, and orchestra. The wealth of melodic material is remarkable, and so is the wonderful euphony of a large number of movements. There can be no doubt that the work has emanated from the composer's truly religious feeling."

The critic of the Neueste Nachrichten is of opinion that "The impression produced by the work was great and lasting. The accents in which the French master speaks are well calculated to elevate and impress, and the hearer follows the composer willingly into the world of his thought and phantasy." He calls the concert one of the best of the season and thanks the Gesang-Verein for enabling music-lovers to make the acquaintance of such an original and beautiful work, which raises the hope that they may soon hear the composer's companion trilogy, "The Redemption."

The Volksblatt wrote: "The choruses are treated throughout in a characteristic manner and they sound well. Perhaps the most effective number is the imposing fugal chorus 'Hosanna in Excelsis'; other movements, such as the 'A custodia matutina' and the Epilogue, are very beautiful. In the second part one beautiful and effective number follows another, the choruses in this part being extremely characteristic and full of dramatic power."

The critics are unanimous in eulogising the enthusiastic zeal and tireless energy which Herr Steinhauer brought to bear upon the preparations for a performance that should be worthy of the great work, and the artistic result of his exertions, both before and during the performance, was such that the French master's trilogy will very likely soon be heard in other towns of the Fatherland.

REVIEWS.

Original Compositions for the Organ. Nos. 260 and 261.
Organ Arrangements. Edited by George C. Martin. Nos. 49-51.
Scherzo. Composed for the Organ by W. S. Hoyte.
[Novello and Company Limited.]

THE first of the above pieces for the "King of Instruments," entitled "Fantasia," is by the late Charles Edward Stephens. It is, however, a Fantasia on the familiar old Psalm-tune "St. James's," composed by Ralph Courteville, organist of St. James's Church, Piccadilly, 1697. Perhaps this complement of the title will be added in a future reprint, also that the work was dedicated by the composer to his friend, Dr. Edward J. Hopkins. It need hardly be said that the Fantasia, consisting of a series of variations on the aforesaid Psalm-tune, is a solid piece of work which will well repay the attention of organists who seek for something more satisfying than "sugary" variations. The fugue, with which the work concludes, is characteristic of those contrapuntal qualifications which the late Mr. Stephens possessed in a high degree. The next number (261) is a Postlude in F, by Dr. Varley Roberts, organist of Magdalen College, Oxford. Brightness and freedom from difficulties are two of the qualifications which may recommend this effective and sequential voluntary. A short episode in A flat affords a pleasant relief to the main sections.

The three numbers of the organ arrangements now before us speak for themselves. The first (No. 49) is a simplified arrangement of Molique's popular march from his oratorio of "Abraham," transcribed by Mr. Arthur C. Edwards. This march was in the répertoire of the late W. T. Best, and in this new arrangement it will doubtless find acceptance with other organists. The Overture to Spohr's "Calvary," with its peculiar notation of eight crotchets in a bar, is the next of the series (No. 50), followed by the last movement of Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" Symphony. The latter completes the whole of the symphony, the previous movements having appeared in Nos. 42 and 46. The advantage of having the entire work not only admirably arranged for the organ, but well spaced out in the printing, is obvious to every organist, and needs no further commendation. For performances of Mendelssohn's familiar work in churches and places where only an organ is available, this arrangement of the symphony will be found indispensable. The transcription, as well as that of the Spohr overture, has been well done by Mr. W. A. C. Cruickshank.

It may be taken for granted that Mr. Hoyte always writes effectively for the instrument upon which he is so skilful a performer. In the present work he not only has something interesting to say, but expresses it in an attractive manner. The main theme of the piece is a busy semiquaver phrase for the lighter stops of the organ—softness and lightness being, in fact, the predominating features throughout. The middle section, in G flat, is a chorale registered for the voix celestes, and forms an effective contrast to the skittish impetuosity of the B flat portion. The Scherzo, which is inscribed to Sir Walter Parratt, will prove an excellent recital piece, and is sure to make its way.

Neue Lieder und Duette (New Songs and Duets). By Peter Cornelius. Vol. 3. Edited by Max Hasse, with English text by Olga L. Sturm.
Twelve Poems. By Gottfried Keller. Set for solo voice, with pianoforte accompaniment by Felix Weingartner. Op. 22. English version by Olga L. Sturm.
[Breitkopf and Härtel.]

THE songs of Peter Cornelius, who, it may be remembered, died in 1874, have of late been heard on several occasions in London concert-rooms. Vocalists seem to find them grateful to sing, in spite of a German authority having written them down as possessing "uncomfortable voice parts," and English critics have bestowed on them those glowing adjectives which public singers like to have hovering round their names. The duets under notice are four in number, the first of which is entitled "Im Sternennacht" ("When starry night"), poem by Paul Heyse. This is written for two sopranos, but the second voice only ascends to the fourth space. The melody is simple, but possesses the charm of a folk-song. The text of the second lyric, "Des Nachts wir uns küssten" ("When nightly we kissed each other"), is by Adalbert von Chamisso, and tells in fanciful fashion how the participators in the gentle practice were betrayed by the stars. The music is of the ballad type and is well suited to the poem. The author of the words of the third song is unknown, "Der Wandrer von der Heimat weit" ("The wand'rer in the lonely wood"), and they are somewhat mystical; but the music is interesting, the voice parts, designed for a soprano and baritone, possessing considerable independence. The final song is a vivacious setting of Frederick Hebbel's poem "Ich und Du" ("Thou and I") and is also suitable for a soprano and baritone. These duets merit the attention of cultured vocalists.

Such singers will also find much pleasure in the twelve lyrics by Felix Weingartner, for they reveal artistic endeavour and much accomplishment. The vocal part calls for singers of dramatic perception, the aim of the composer manifestly being to realise, we had almost said materialise, the spirit of the text. This in some cases results in a restlessness of tonality and occasional plunges into extraneous keys not always justified by the effect produced; but the songs in their entirety possess a vividness and earnestness of expression that will make them welcome to many musicians.

Choral and Orchestral Societies. By L. C. Venables.
[J. Curwen and Sons, Limited.]

THIS is an amplified edition (the third), now enlarged to 254 pages, of a popular and very useful manual by a conductor of long experience. Mr. Venables modestly designates his treatise a "book of hints" on the organisation and management, business and musical, of choral and orchestral societies, but it more than answers to that description. The book is thoroughly practical and may be recommended to all who are interested in the subject of which it treats.

Wanderer's Night Song. The words translated from the German of Eichendorff, and the music composed by Graham P. Moore.

A Sunbeam Messenger. The words by Mrs. Henry Crewe. The music composed by T. R. G. Jozé.

[Novello and Company Limited.]

THE meditative character of the text selected by Mr. Moore is admirably expressed by the suave nature of the vocal part, while the restlessness and longing which underlie the words are effectively suggested by the accompaniment. The song is suitable to a male or female singer, and the compass, only extending from E to E, places the song in this respect within the abilities of all vocalists.

Sunbeams now-a-days are pressed into various services, from taking photographs to killing microbes, but it has been reserved to poets to use them as verbal messengers. Mrs. Crewe seems, however, to have no doubt as to their reliability in this respect if sufficiently trusted by people really in love with each other, and Dr. Jozé has set the pleasing fancy in a manner that will appeal to cultured music-lovers, affording opportunity for tenors to advantageously display the charms of their voices and the sanguine nature of their temperament. A feature of the song is the musicianly nature of the pianoforte accompaniment, which, however, is by no means difficult to read at sight.

The Princely Chandos. A memoir of the first Duke of Chandos. By John Robert Robinson. New and cheaper edition. [Sampson Low, Marston and Co., Limited.]

THE musical interest of this book lies in the fact that the Duke of Chandos employed Handel as his Master of Musik at his princely seat of Canons, near Edgware. Handel, who succeeded Dr. Pepusch in this post, composed his celebrated "Chandos Anthems" as well as his oratorio "Esther" during his residence at Canons. If Mr. Robinson does not tell us anything new about the composer of "The Messiah," he has compiled a very readable account of "The Princely Chandos" and his regal style of living. The eight illustrations are not the least interesting feature of the volume.

Nisi Dominus (Except the Lord build the House). Psalm cxxvii. Composed by G. F. Handel. Edited, with English words and a pianoforte accompaniment, by T. W. Bourne. [Novello and Company Limited.]

IT is satisfactory to find that Handel's setting of the 127th Psalm has at last been published in its entirety and furnished with a well-fitted English text. Until Mr. Bourne had shown that the "Gloria Patri" for double-chorus, published by the German Handel Society, and issued by Messrs. Novello for performance at the Handel Festival of 1891, was the missing number from the "Nisi Dominus," its issue in its present form was impossible, for the music broke off abruptly with the tenor solo "Beatus vir," in B minor. Mr. Bourne has pointed out that the "Gloria" is in the same key as the opening number of the "Nisi Dominus," that the general usage of repeating the opening phrase of a work at the words "Sicut erat" of the final movement is adopted in this "Gloria," and that Handel followed this practice in a composition of the same period as the "Nisi Dominus." This evidence being accepted as conclusive, it follows that the Psalm was completed in Rome on July 13, 1707, which corresponds with Chrysander's opinion concerning the period of the earlier numbers of the music. The original MS. probably perished by fire at Clifton, in 1860. The only contemporary MSS. known to exist are a Smith copy containing the first five numbers, in the collection at Buckingham Palace, and a copy in an Italian hand of the "Gloria Patri," now in the possession of Mr. W. H. Cummings. On these the present edition is based. In an interesting preface Mr. Bourne mentions that the fifth number, a tenor solo, is principally constructed from the opening phrase of Benedetto Marcello's Violin Sonata in B minor (Op. 9); but what Handel has raised to the dignity of a subject occurs only in the first bar of the first section and in the first bar of the second section of the introductory Adagio of the Sonata. The editor further remarks that the accompaniment to the first chorus of the "Nisi Dominus" seems to have suggested the arpeggios given to the violins in "Zadok the Priest," written twenty years later; while the two subjects of the "Et in sæcula sæculorum, Amen," are used with some alteration for the "Allelujah" of "The King shall rejoice"; this movement being again employed as a final chorus in "Deborah"; also that in the soprano part of the last chorus, bars 43 and 44, is found the subject of "Let old Timotheus," in "Alexander's Feast." Thus, apart from its musical value, which is great, the "Nisi Dominus" possesses much interest, and choral conductors will do well to give attention to the work. It consists of a thoroughly Handelian opening chorus in five parts of contrapuntal character, two short but effective tenor solos, an extended passage for an alto voice, a vigorous bass song, and the "Gloria Patri" in eight parts, which forms an imposing Finale.

The greatest praise is due to Mr. Bourne for the painstaking and conscientious manner in which he has discharged the responsible duties of editor. The original consecutive fourths which offend in the fourth number have been retained, but put in brackets; and the accompaniments he has supplied, which Handel would seem to have forgotten to provide, or has but faintly indicated, are in entire sympathy with the rest of the work.

Congregational Hymn Anthems. By Warwick Jordan.

Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in E. By Archibald W. Wilson.

Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in D and G. By G. Richmond Fleming.

[Novello and Company Limited.]

THE "Congregational Hymn Anthems" consist of well-known hymns in certain portions of which the congregation are invited to join and in others to keep silence while the choir sing varied arrangements of the tune. The hymns chosen for the first three of the series are respectively "Before the ending of the day," to "Rockingham" tune, the "Old hundredth," and "O God, our help in ages past," to St. Ann's tune. The first example is opened by a bass solo consisting of the first verse, which is afterwards repeated by the congregation. A variation of the tune is then sung by the choir, which subsequently is given some contrapuntal variations, while the congregation has the last verse in unison. A similar method is pursued in the other two hymns, but the second is less elaborate.

Mr. Wilson's setting of the Evening Canticles calls for a well trained choir, by whom it could be made impressive. It would be suitable for festival services.

Mr. Fleming's music for the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis is also suited for festivals, but it makes less demands on the abilities of a choir than the above, although it is quite as effective. It contains solo passages for soprano and tenor and the four-part writing is vocal and melodious.

Manasse. Dramatic Poem by Joseph Victor Wedmann. Set to music by Friedrich Hegar (Op. 16). English version by Mrs. John P. Morgan.

[Leipzig and Zurich: Gebrüder Hug and Co.]

THIS work is an oratorio of long accepted type. There are four soloists: Esra (baritone), leader of the Jewish folk; Manasse (tenor), son of the High Priest Jojada; Nicaso (soprano), his wife; and a Herald (bass). The libretto may be said to set forth the triumph of conjugal love over the dogma of religion. Manasse has married an "alien woman," and is called upon to renounce her or become an outcast from his tribe. He remains faithful to his spouse, and apparently obtains a considerable following consequent on his appeal, "Whoever, as I, his wife more truly loves, than he the curse of priest deluded fearest, he follow me." From this quotation it will be gathered that the translator has been more solicitous to secure unity in accentuation between words and music than to produce ordinary English. The work is divided into three scenes. In the first, Esra appeals to the people to lead a holy life, and accuses Manasse of having taken "an alien, heathen maid, not many days agone, to wife." Esra speaks for the most part in recitative and is answered by the people in choruses of vigorous and diatonic character, and the scene ends with a well-worked choral fugue of Handelian style. In the next portion are introduced the erring Manasse and his wife, who, judging by the latter's question, "Why do our glances yearning, afar to cloudland fly?" and the sentimental nature of the music, are enjoying their honeymoon. Their complacent comparisons and interchange of melodious intervals are, however, interrupted by the arrival of a herald, who summons Manasse to attend Esra's court, and the second scene closes in dramatic fashion with the declaration of the "folk" to follow true love, as exemplified in Manasse and his wife, to the trial. In the third scene Manasse refuses to give up his wife, and is duly cursed by Esra; but, as in the case of another celebrated curse, "nobody seemed a penny the worse," and Manasse departs rejoicing with his wife and "folk," declaring "Not immured in temple frowning, dwells our God for evermore." The solos possess no distinctiveness beyond a certain robust vigour and directness of expression, but the work in its entirety may be acceptable to choral societies whose members incline to oratorio of Handelian pattern.

Hymn-Melodies and Sequences for the whole year, &c. Printed for the Plain-Song and Mediæval Music Society.

[Office of the Organist and Choirmaster.]

The former of these two books contains seventy-seven "Plain-song Hymn Melodies" from the Sarum, York, Hereford, and Barking Hymnals, in addition to sequences for the principal days of the year from the Sarum Gradual and other sources, an interesting preface, and "a complete table of the hymns." An index of first lines adds to the value of the book for those whose church music creed is plain-song.

MUSIC IN BIRMINGHAM.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The various series of subscription concerts organised by our different musical bodies were brought to a close last month, the increase in concerts this season being an event of considerable importance, especially in regard to strictly orchestral concerts.

Mr. Paderewski has been the hero of the hour and had the privilege of drawing the largest audience that has ever been known to have been present at a pianoforte recital in our Town Hall. The occasion was Messrs. Harrison's last concert of the season, which took place on March 28. The most remarkable performance was vested in the excerpts from Chopin, which included the Nocturne in G (Op. 57, No. 2), the Studies, Nos. 6, 8, and 9, from Book II. (Op. 25), the Berceuse, and the great Polonaise in A flat.

A programme full of interest was provided by the Festival Choral Society at its third and last orchestral concert of the present series, which was given at the Town Hall on March 24, in the presence of a large and appreciative audience, under Dr. C. Swinnerton Heap's skilful conductorship. A feature of the concert was Mr. Leonard Borwick's scholarly performance of Beethoven's Fourth Pianoforte Concerto, admirably accompanied by the orchestra. The principal novelty consisted of the first rendering here of Tschaïkowsky's Symphony (No. 5) in E minor (Op. 64), a worthy companion to the "Pathétique." German's symphonic poem "Hamlet," written for our last Musical Festival, was another welcome piece, and created quite a storm of applause on its conclusion. Mr. Watkin Mills was the vocalist.

Miss Fanny Davies's annual concert took place at the Masonic Hall on March 22. She had for her coadjutor Dr. Joachim, the eminent violinist. The two artists gave a truly magnificent performance of Brahms's Sonata (Op. 100), and in their respective soli Miss Fanny Davies and Dr. Joachim quite aroused the enthusiasm of the audience. Miss Louise Phillips proved herself an accomplished vocalist.

Mr. Max Mossel's drawing-room concerts terminated on March 31, the handsome Grosvenor Rooms of the Grand Hotel being again completely filled by a fashionable audience. The Bohemian String Quartet constituted the artistic personnel, and its first appearance here was crowned with the utmost success.

Of much interest was the first production on any stage of a new military comic opera, "The Dandy Fifth," the libretto and lyrics by the well-known playwright Mr. G. R. Sims, music by Clarence Corri, which took place at the Prince of Wales's Theatre, on Easter Monday, in the presence of a packed and most enthusiastic assembly. The subject-matter is that of the "Queen's shilling," made familiar to playgoers under the Kendal régime. Mr. Sims has made of it a delightful comic opera, notwithstanding its original dramatic episodes, and has brought his dialogue up to date, creating at the same time some highly amusing characters in the persons of a Hibernian Sergeant-Major called Milligan and a Cockney Trooper named Brown. The truly comic element is invested in these two personages, who hold the stage from the rise to the fall of the curtain. All that modern stagecraft, exquisite costumes, and a perfect mise-en-scène can do has been accomplished to the letter, and there is every prospect that "The Dandy Fifth" will enjoy a successful career. Mr. Corri has admirably suited his music to the words, there being numbers in the score that are likely to enjoy widespread popularity. Such are the song and chorus "Tommy's Tournament" and the "Toast of the Dandy Fifth." The music is tuneful and not without its touches of humour, much in the manner of Sir Arthur Sullivan.

The St. Monica's Choral Society, Edgbaston, gave a fair rendering of Spohr's "Last Judgment," at King's Norton Church, in aid of the church extension fund. The principals were Miss May Berry, Mr. Upton Wright, and Mr. Frank S. Hunter. Mr. Leonard Gocher was the conductor, and Mr. T. Johnson presided at the organ.

The members of the Edgbaston Church Choral Society, with the assistance of the church choir, gave, on March 29, an impressive performance of Sir John Stainer's sacred cantata "The Crucifixion," at the Edgbaston Parish Church. The principal vocalists were Mr. John Walker and Mr. H. A. Sims; Mr. A. R. Gaul presided at the organ, and Mr. Theodore S. Tearne conducted.

Haydn's oratorio the "Creation" was given on the 6th ult., at the King's Heath Institute, by the King's Heath Choral Society, under Mr. J. H. Adams's able conductorship. The principals were Miss Aimée Wathen, Mr. J. Walker, and Mr. H. J. England.

An admirable performance of Sterndale Bennett's cantata "May Queen" was given on March 25, at the Moseley and Balsall Heath Institute, by the Moseley Choral Society, Mr. W. Berridge Hicks conducting. There was a full band and chorus of 100 performers, the principal parts being assigned to Miss Nellie Wiseman, Miss Eva Prime, Mr. Samuel Evans, and Mr. William Evans.

The Midlands Musical Society, under the direction of Mr. H. M. Stevenson, gave its annual performance of Gounod's sacred trilogy "The Redemption," in the Town Hall, on Good Friday evening. With the exception of "The Messiah" and the "Elijah," no oratorio has been so frequently given here as "The Redemption." Every Good Friday (since its production at the Birmingham Festival of 1882) our Town Hall is thronged with an eager and attentive audience to do homage to the performance of "The Redemption" by this Society. Mr. Stevenson has a large chorus under his control, but, as usual, the soprano section is much stronger than the others, the weakest portion being the tenors, consequently it is impossible to establish an even balance of tone. The singing, however, was not lacking in tone-power and impressiveness. The orchestra did its work very fairly, and Mr. C. W. Perkins rendered, as usual, excellent service at the organ. The principals were Miss Rose Jones, Miss K. Editha Sankey, and Miss Minnie Hackett; Messrs. Saml. Fenn, George H. Brydges, R. Percy Taunton, and Mr. Bennett.

Mr. George Halford's series of ten orchestral concerts was brought to a brilliant conclusion, in the Town Hall, on March 29. These concerts have not proved a financial success, but, artistically speaking, have aroused widespread enthusiasm, and there is every prospect that the coming series will bring its full complement of subscribers. The feature of the last concert was Miss Clotilde Kleeberg's magnificent playing of Schumann's Pianoforte Concerto in A minor, faultlessly accompanied by the orchestra.

The Birmingham Choral Union, under Mr. Thomas Facer's conductorship, gave a popular concert, in the Town Hall, on the 16th ult. There was a very poor attendance, but those present greatly appreciated the singing of the choir.

A better balance of voices is required before complete artistic results can be attained. The selection comprised several choruses from Handel's works, the part-song "How sweet the moonlight sleeps," by Leslie, and several choruses selected from Mr. Facer's cantatas. Mr. C. W. Perkins was the organist, the other artists being the St. Chad Vocal Quartet, Miss Beatrice Vernon, and Miss Eugenie Usher.

MUSIC IN BRISTOL.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The Lent performance of Gounod's "Redemption" by the Bristol Choral Society was marked by the strength, unity, and finish which always characterise the singing of this famous body of amateurs. Previous knowledge of the Trilogy and additional study enabled the singers to worthily represent the work under the direction of Mr. Riseley, the painstaking and energetic conductor. The principal vocalists were Miss Esther Palliser, Miss Barton, Miss Florence Cromey, Miss Aldersley, Mr. Dean Trotter, Mr. W. Thomas, Mr. Montague Worlock, Mr. A. E. Gough, and Mr. Maas, who discharged their duties well.

Bristol North Choral Society performed the first part of Haydn's "Creation" at its annual concert, on the 19th ult. On the 20th ult. the City Road Choral Society gave a representation of Handel's "Samson."

The Bristol Society of Instrumentalists, considered to be among the largest bodies of the kind in the Kingdom, gave its annual concert on the 2nd ult., the programme embracing Mendelssohn's "Calm sea and prosperous voyage" Overture, movements from Mozart's Symphony in E flat, the Suite, No. 1, from Sir Arthur Sullivan's ballet "Victoria and Merrie England," and Weber's "Peter Schmoll" Overture. Miss Maud Riseley appeared as a solo violinist and played with marked success Max Bruch's Concerto, and Miss Rose Thomas skilfully performed Mendelssohn's Capriccio Brillante for pianoforte in B minor (Op. 22). The vocalists were Miss Kate Anderson (Bristol scholar at the Royal College of Music) and Mr. Haigh Jackson, both residents of the city.

Stainer's "Crucifixion" was sung during Lent in the Church of St. Mary Redcliffe, where it was first heard in our city shortly after its publication.

The all too brief season of chamber concerts of Miss Lock was brought to a close on March 28, when the talented lady and her associates played works by Beethoven, Spohr, Dvorák, and Max Bruch, and Miss Lilian Havard contributed songs.

After prolonged preliminary discussion the Committee appointed to prepare a scheme for a Festival next year presented their plan to the former guarantors at the end of March, and it was unanimously decided to hold the tenth Festival in the autumn of 1899, provided a guarantee fund of £4,000 be raised before August 1 this year.

Chipping Sodbury Choral Society performed Rossini's "Stabat Mater" at the end of March, with Mrs. Woodbridge, Mrs. J. W. Trenfield, Dr. Sanders, and Mr. F. Millman as soloists.

Radstock Choral Society gave a representation of Cowen's "The Rose Maiden," on March 23. Miss A. L. Burns, Miss Wood, Mr. Wotton, and Mr. Poole were the principals.

Handel's "Judas Maccabæus" was given by Clevedon Philharmonic Society, under the direction of Mr. Edward Cook, on the 13th ult., the soloists being Miss Marion Harris, Miss Ethel Button, Miss G. Wickenden, Mr. W. Fancourt, and Mr. A. Trowbridge.

At the Spring concert of the Weston-super-Mare Philharmonic Society, on the 14th ult., praiseworthy performances were given of Handel's "Acis and Galatea" and Mendelssohn's "First Walpurgis Night." The principals were Miss Marion Harris, Miss Jean Powell, Mr. Humphrey Jones, Mr. W. Fancourt, and Mr. Montague Worlock. Mr. Cook conducted.

The Western Counties Musical Festival took place in the Victoria Hall, Exeter, on the 14th ult. The band and chorus numbered 400, under the conductorship of Dr. Wood. There were two performances, Haydn's "Creation," Parts I. and II., and Sir Frederick Bridge's "Flag of England" forming the programme of the afternoon concert. "The Flag of England" and the same composer's cantata "The Cradle of Christ" were included in the evening concert. Sir Frederick Bridge conducted an admirable performance of his own works, and, as usual, "The Flag of England" roused the audience to uncommon enthusiasm. This is by far the most successful Festival given by the Western Counties Association.

MUSIC IN DUBLIN.

The Dublin Musical Society gave its closing concert for the season on March 28, at the Royal University Buildings. The somewhat lengthy programme consisted of Handel's "Israel in Egypt" and Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," the principal vocalists being Madame Regina de Sales, Mrs. Scarff-Goodman, Miss Elsie Connolly, and Mr. Reginald Brophy. The band and choir numbered 400 performers and were, as usual, ably directed by Dr. Joseph Smith. Mr. John Horan, senior, presided at the organ and Mr. Arthur Darley led the strings.

A pianoforte recital by Paderewski took place at the New Theatre Royal, Hawkins Street, on the afternoon of March 30, and a crowded audience assembled to hear and admire the interpretation of a programme of varied character by the great virtuoso. Three Liszt-Schubert transcriptions, including the "Erl-King," Chopin's Nocturne in G minor, Polonaise in A flat, Berceuse (Op. 37), and three "little" Etudes, a Barcarolle of Rubinstein, a Rhapsodie of Liszt, and a Minuet by the gifted pianist himself were amongst the pieces performed.

On the same date Gaul's "Holy City" was performed at St. Matthias's Church, with a miscellaneous selection.

A concert in connection with the Lucina Fête was given at the Rotunda on the 4th ult., under the direction of Dr. T. R. G. Jozé. Misses Shellard, Lucy Ashton Hackett, Florence Murphy, Victoria Delaney (violin), Josephine Sullivan (harp); Messrs. Dan Jones, Chas. Jozé, J. F. Jones, and Archie Rosenthal (pianoforte) rendered a programme of excellent class with much success.

During Holy Week Bach's "St. John" Passion Music was given at St. Patrick's Cathedral, under the direction of the Cathedral organist, Mr. Chas. F. Marchant.

Herr Bast's concert took place on the 18th ult., at the Antient Concert Rooms. The eminent violoncellist was assisted by some of the principal Dublin instrumentalists and by Miss Etlinger (soprano). The programme included Rubinstein's Cantata for pianoforte and violoncello, a Fantasia on Irish airs for the same instruments, and a Suite on Irish airs for string quartet, the last two arrangements being Herr Bast's own work.

Too late for detailed notice in the present issue came the second concert this season of the Dublin Glee and Madrigal Union, at the Antient Concert Rooms, and the centenary performance of Haydn's "Creation," at Rathmines New Town Hall, announced for the 27th ult., under the direction of Mr. Raymond Revelle.

Arrangements have been completed for the celebration of the "Feis Ceoil," or Irish Musical Festival, in Belfast, during the week commencing the 2nd inst. There will be four evening concerts, under the direction of Dr. F. Koeller, and the mornings will be devoted to various musical competitions.

MUSIC IN EAST ANGLIA.

The Norwich Festival Committee were responsible for a very successful concert, held in St. Andrew's Hall, on March 24, being the second of the series of three given by that body between the last and the next triennial musical festival. The principal object of these gatherings is to keep the chorus in practice and at the same time to provide entertainment of a high class for the Norwich public. Spohr's "Last Judgment" and Rossini's "Stabat Mater" were the works selected, and it may be truly said that at no previous concert has the chorus sung with greater spirit or with more intelligence. The performance reflected great credit upon the chorus-master and conductor, Dr. Horace Hill. The principal vocalists were Miss Helen Jaxon, Madame Alice Lamb, Mr. J. Leyland, and Mr. Bantock Pierpoint, all of whom were successful with the vocal solo and concerted music. The band (led by Mr. F. W. B. Noverre) was composed mainly of the Norwich Philharmonic Society, strengthened here and there by importations from London. Dr. Bunnett did useful work at the organ.

The usual Good Friday performance of "The Messiah" took place in St. Andrew's Hall, Norwich, on the afternoon of Good Friday, organised by Drs. Bunnett and Hill for the benefit of the local charities. The popularity of the oratorio was again proved by the large audience present. The large majority of the festival chorus and members of the Philharmonic Society give a very practical bent to their charitable feelings by singing and playing on these occasions without fee or reward, except such as their good actions may bring them, and it is pleasing to record that their part of the performance was highly commendable. The principal vocalists were Miss Lillian Coomber, Miss May Seiber, Mr. Emlyn Jones, and Mr. Arthur Strugnell. Dr. Hill conducted, while Mr. F. W. B. Noverre led the band and Dr. Bunnett presided at the organ.

Following the customary practice of having an elaborate musical service at Eastertide, the Dean and Chapter of Norwich Cathedral arranged for the performance of Parts I. and II. of Gounod's "Redemption," which were accordingly sung on the afternoon of the 15th ult., in the presence of a congregation which completely filled the spacious nave of that edifice. The solos were most reverently and artistically sung by members of the Cathedral choir. The chorus, numbering about 200 voices, was mostly composed of church choirs drawn from different points of the diocese. A capable band of fifty performers, resident in the diocese, played the accompaniments with more than usual refinement. Dr. Bates, the Cathedral organist, may be congratulated upon the success which he took so much pains to achieve.

At Ipswich a wise step has been taken by the amalgamation of the local choral society and the Nonconformist Choir Union, for by such a junction of forces a better and stronger body of choristers is brought together. The initial venture of the combined forces was Handel's "Israel in Egypt," a work which was sufficient to try the mettle of any choral society. Fortunately, Ipswich possesses a conductor in the person of Mr. B. H. Burton, a musical enthusiast, who spares neither time nor trouble in bringing to a successful issue any work he takes in hand. Nothing but praise can be accorded for the excellent performance of "Israel," on the 1st ult., under his guidance. A very capable band of sixty performers, led by Mr. F. B. Smythies, left nothing to be desired in regard to the accompaniments. Miss Agnes Nicholls, Miss Sarah Davies, Madame Marian McKenzie, Mr. Iver McKay, Mr. Bantock Pierpoint, and Mr. F. W. Dalby proved themselves to be capable soloists.

The St. Margaret's Choral and Orchestral Society, Ipswich, with the assistance of some members of a similar body from Woodbridge, gave a concert in the Lecture Hall, on March 24, when Hamish MacCunn's cantata "Bonny Kilmeny" and Mendelssohn's 42nd Psalm were the two principal pieces. Both received a careful and successful interpretation under the conductorship of Mr. James Price. Miss Hilda Alexander, Miss Maude Richardson, Mr. A. G. Scales, and Mr. E. W. Dalby took the principal vocal parts, the accompaniments being played by the orchestra of the Society.

With a band and chorus numbering about 100 performers, Haydn's "Passion," or "The Seven last Words," was rendered in the Parish Church, Lowestoft, on the evening of Good Friday, in the presence of a congregation of about 1,500 persons. Mr. H. D. Flowers conducted a very satisfactory performance, with the help as principals of Master James McBean, Miss A. Mills, Mr. Sydney Mannering, and Mr. J. H. Brockbank. Mr. A. S. Coote Suggit led the band.

The Association of Village Choirs of North-West Norfolk held its first annual competition in the Town Hall, Hunstanton, on the 16th ult. There were six competitions, and so close in order of merit were the competing choirs that the examiners, Dr. Bates (Norwich Cathedral) and Dr. Alan Gray (Trinity College, Cambridge), found considerable difficulty in making their awards. In speaking to a vote of thanks passed for his services, Dr. Bates said the result of the competition was decidedly encouraging, and that much good would result from the work of the Association.

The Watton Amateur Choral Society gave a concert, on the 14th ult., in the Wayland Hall, for the benefit of the Victoria Cottage Hospital. Thanks to the efficient efforts of Miss A. L. Wood, who has been training the choir, the members sang several part-songs in good style.

The Kirkley Madrigal Society gave its fourth concert, in the Lowestoft Pier Concert Room, on the 13th ult., conducted by Mr. Philip Chignell, the accompaniments being played by Messrs. H. D. Flowers and A. C. Kemp. The choir numbered about forty-five voices, and several glees and part-songs were rendered with spirit.

MUSIC IN EDINBURGH.

(From our own Correspondent.)

On the 13th ult., at the first University Graduation ceremony held in the new McEwan Hall, Matthew Shirlaw was presented by Professor Niecks for the degree of Mus. Bac., Edin.—the first degree in music granted after examination by any Scottish University. Mr. Collinson, the newly-appointed organist to the University, gave a recital during the hour which preceded the ceremony.

The end of our musical season brings the usual harvest gathered by the various minor choral societies; and it is very gratifying to observe that so many are at work and show such enterprise and ambition as can be seen in the following list of works given during the past month—some of them with orchestral accompaniment:—Stainer's "Crucifixion" (St. Michael's, 7th; Free High and St. James's, both on 8th ult.); Mendelssohn's "O, come let us sing" (Greenside, 6th ult.); Cowen's "Rose Maiden" (Broughton Place); "Hymn of Praise" (Lauriston Place, March 31; Davidson Memorial, March 28; United Choirs of St. Mary's Cathedral, 14th ult.), &c.

A peculiarly delightful and important recital was that of "The Messiah" given by the children's choir of South Morningside Free Church. Mr. W. Campbell is heartily to be congratulated on the result of his work. The tenor and bass parts were sustained by older friends, some of them Choral Union members.

On the 9th ult. the pupils of the Choral Union scheme for feeding its ranks with properly prepared members gave their annual concert in the Music Hall to a large and enthusiastic audience. The first part of the programme consisted of a selection from "The Messiah"; the second part was miscellaneous. In both parts the solos were undertaken with entire acceptance by members of the class which is so well trained by Mr. James Dowie.

Mr. Borthwick's choir may be looked on as a new combination, although it is the immediate outcome and successor of an older association. It gave a successful performance of the "Creation" in the Literary Institute, on the 25th ult.

Mr. Lingard's Ladies' Choir closed its eighth session with a concert in the Freemasons' Hall, at which the principal work was Dr. Vincent's "Little Mermaid." Vocal and instrumental solos, &c., eked out a programme which gave evident pleasure to a good audience.

Besides the "Hymn of Praise," which, with elaborate preparation, full orchestral accompaniment, and the entire symphony in its rightful place, attracted a very large congregation to the Cathedral, on the 14th ult., the united choirs made the most important contribution of the month to music in Edinburgh, when, following up last year's initiative, the "St. Matthew" Passion was given in the Cathedral, on the evening of the 1st ult. The beautiful building was packed in every corner by a multitude who listened in solemn quietness as the wonderful work unfolded the story of the Passion in the only environment suitable or even possible for its proper rendering. Mr. Gledhill sang the arduous tenor work of narration with conspicuous care and a fine taste which ensured the gratifying success he achieved. Mr. Collinson conducted.

MUSIC IN GLASGOW.

The appearance made by the pupils of the Glasgow Athenæum School of Music, on the evening of March 25, was so excellent that a record of the doings at St. Andrew's Hall may be fairly claimed. It was the eighth annual concert in connection with Principal Allan MacBeth's prosperous Institution, and the function serves periodically to show the general working of the School. The concerts are, moreover, part of the educational course. Mr. MacBeth, who conducted the one under notice, had, as usual, devised an interesting programme, which included Mendelssohn's Pianoforte Concerto (No. 2) in D minor and De Beriot's Seventh Violin Concerto. Each of the three movements pertaining to those familiar compositions fell to a different (lady) student, and it should be at once said that the experiment was amply justified by its wonderfully artistic success. Various organ solos and songs were contributed during the evening, and the orchestra, which included over thirty lady violinists, showed a distinct advance on any previous experience in regard to fulness of tone, firmness of attack, and careful attention to the nuances. On March 29 the Glasgow Glee and Catch Club gave its annual concert, under the direction of Councillor George Taggart. The pieces included Stevens's "Cloud-capt towers," Horsley's "By Celia's arbour," Genée's droll "Italian salad," and Wainwright's "Life's a bumper," the rendering of all the numbers being marked by real artistic perception. On the evening just named the Partick Choral Society gave a recital of the "Spring" section of Haydn's "Seasons," as also selections from Handel's "Samson." Mr. Terras's interesting choir is a welcome feature in our musical life.

The event of the season was reserved for the evening of March 30, when Dr. Joachim's famous Quartet appeared in the Queen's Rooms. "Society" turned out in large numbers to hear the combination in Mozart's Quartet in G major, Brahms's Op. 51, No. 2, and Beethoven's great B flat Quartet (Op. 130). It may, however, be doubted if a large majority of the audience had any idea of what the function was all about! Unfortunately, it is no secret that chamber music in the "second city of the Empire" has fallen upon evil days. But warm thanks are due to the promoters of the concert for affording a treat as rare as it was artistic. On March 31 the members of the Glasgow United Young Men's Christian Association Choir gave a good performance of Handel's "Samson" in the City Hall. The Choir numbers some 500 voices and is under the skilful direction of Mr. R. L. Reid. On the 4th ult. Stainer's "Crucifixion" was given in Free College Church by a choir well trained by Mr. J. Crossland Hirst, the organist of the church; and on the previous evening Stainer's impressive and popular work was rendered after the close of the usual service in Helensburgh United Presbyterian Church. At the second concert for the season of the Largs Choral Society, Mendelssohn's 42nd Psalm and Gade's "Erl-King's Daughter" were performed; and on the 6th ult. the choir of Lansdowne Church gave, amongst other things, Gounod's "Gallia," a work which ought to be heard oftener than conductors evidently care to bring its musicianly strains under notice.

It is to be hoped that the Glasgow Choral Union will be able to arrange for an annual performance of Bach's "St. Matthew" Passion in the Glasgow Cathedral. The work was given in that venerable edifice on the 6th ult., when the attendance was again very large. A singularly fine performance was accorded the oratorio, and the accompaniments were in the good hands of the Glasgow Amateur Orchestral Society, aided by a contingent of professional players. The soloists comprised Misses Jenny Taggart and Thornton, Messrs. T. Hendry Brearley and John Browning; Mr. W. H. Cole led the orchestra, Mr. Luther Hall was at the pianoforte, Mr. Bradley conducted, and, during an interval, Dr. P. Macadam Muir, the minister of the Cathedral, gave a short and appropriate address on Passion music as an act of solemn worship.

Glasgow musical folks are highly interested in the appointment which Mr. John B. McEwen, M.A.—"a town's boy"—has secured at the Royal Academy of Music, London—that of Professor of Harmony. Mr. McEwen is an Academy student, a "Charles Lucas" medalist, and has acted as sub-professor to Dr. Prout. Mr. McEwen has also earned laurels on the teaching staff of the Glasgow Athenæum School of Music.

MUSIC IN LIVERPOOL AND DISTRICT.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The customary Spring visit of the Royal Carl Rosa Opera Company terminated on the 16th ult. During the four weeks thus covered the traditions so intimately associated with the Royal Court Theatre at such a time have been to some extent preserved. It was formerly in the regular order of things that the most important new works for the coming season should have their first footing on the boards of what was then the special property and homestead of the Rosa organisation, and following in such a sequence now has to be recorded the production of Sullivan's "Martyr of Antioch," the revival of Mendelssohn's "Son and Stranger," and the doing into English of Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde." The first-named, plus the familiar "Highland Message" ("Thou'rt passing hence") and the beautiful chorus "Wreaths for our graves," created a considerable impression; but whether the rehabilitated composition will have taken a new lease of life or not remains to be placed in more distinct evidence. The Mendelssohn operetta was highly interesting and acceptable, and Wagner's great work had been so judiciously pruned and fitted to the proportions of the stage of the provincial theatre, that results followed which were as satisfactory as might be expected. Old favourites, such as Wallace's "Maritana," and things new to Liverpool, as, for instance, MacCunn's "Diarmid," went to complete the scheme of the month's engagement, which, however, failed to rouse the proverbial apathy of a Liverpool audience to anything like enthusiasm.

The closing concert of the Philharmonic Society was devoted to the "St. Matthew" Passion of Bach, of which a performance of general acceptance was given on March 25, under Mr. F. H. Cowen. There have been no other great choral performances in Liverpool since our last record except two on Good Friday. One of these was the customary "Messiah," given free to the poor, under Mr. H. A. Branscombe, and Gounod's "Redemption," by the Musical Society, under Mr. D. O. Parry. Both took place at St. George's Hall.

There have been held during the past month some important meetings connected with various religious denominations in this city. Of these may be named as of leading interest one which was termed a Welsh Musical Festival, in Pembroke Baptist Chapel, when a choir of 500 voices rendered a selection of hymns and chants, under the conductorship of Messrs. J. T. Jones, A. R. Thomas, and D. Davies. Another somewhat similar gathering took place at Great George Street Chapel, the Welsh Congregationalists being to the front with about 600 singers, under Messrs. D. W. Lewis and T. R. Jones. Local Eisteddfoddau have been held in Birkenhead, Chester, Rhyl, and various other centres in North Wales.

The Società Armonica gave an excellent concert on the 6th ult., under Mr. V. Akeroyd, the leading number of the programme being Schumann's Symphony (No. 2, in C). The Wirral Amateur Orchestral Society closed its sixteenth season, under Mr. E. Schiever, with a unique programme, in which Fuchs's Serenade for strings and horns and Saint-Saëns's Septuor for pianoforte, strings, and trumpet found a place. Yet another orchestral society has been formed in the locality of New Brighton, and it bids fair to be a success under Mr. Theodore Lawson. The Liverpool Orchestral Society has terminated a highly successful season with the usual ladies' concert. At the orchestral concert of the College of Music, given at the end of the Spring term, Mozart's Symphony in E flat was very well performed by about forty of the students, under Mr. Courvoisier.

Too late for notice at present, a performance was promised by that unique organisation, the Goossens Choir, for the 26th ult.

In our notice last month of the recent performance of Gounod's "Faust" at Southport, the name of Mr. J. C. Clarke should have been given as conductor. The Society in question—the Southport Choral—also gave Handel's "Messiah," under Mr. Clarke's direction, on Good Friday.

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

In all our provincial towns the musical season coincides with the winter months. A survey of its activity and results may therefore be most usefully made when the lengthening days of Spring and the increasing charm of outdoor life draw us away for a time from the concert-room. There are many reasons why this year the review must be specially interesting. A period of trial has been successfully passed in the life of institutions which had suffered greatly through supineness of management and the consequent waning of interest. Happily, fresh vigour has revived the public goodwill, and has tided us over the difficulties which caused some doubt as to the continuance of some of our chief undertakings. A spirit of hopefulness has also been strengthened by the evidently widening circle of earnest students of serious music, by the increasingly discriminative judgment shown, and the obviously independent estimate formed as to any real merit either in the fresh works produced or as to the adequacy of their rendering. The history of any art has repeatedly shown how far more reliable and trustworthy is the broad verdict of the general public than the lightly and hastily uttered opinion of those who may have barely emerged from tutelage which has left their opinions in a somewhat raw state, swayed by partisanship and by prejudices not yet shaken off. The evidence of the past three years shows that music here no longer depends upon patronage either of the leisured classes or of those who assume to tell us what to admire and what to condemn, but upon the wider and far more stable basis of an ever-growing general appreciation of the width of its domain and the power of its appeal.

Necessarily, in any estimate of our present position our thoughts turn first to those orchestral concerts which—while they must not be supposed to be everything to us—still are the most important of our undertakings, and have done much to familiarise us with a class of music with which our purely local societies are unable to grapple. A great deal of nonsense has been talked and written about our indebtedness to the enterprise which established an efficient orchestra as a more or less resident organisation here. It is absurd to suppose that Manchester alone could have remained stagnant during the last half-century, during which, in every corner of the land, such vast progress has been made. Everywhere music has been brought within the reach of all classes of the community, and has been popularised to a degree which not even the most sanguine of its older lovers could have looked for.

And the great success of the Thursday evening gatherings during the last two seasons has been all the more gratifying because of the evidence afforded of the rapid growth of a higher taste and of a keener judgment. There has constantly been the prompt and enthusiastic acknowledgment of any unusual excellence; and Mr. Cowen has repeatedly had to acknowledge the plaudits which have greeted the performances of the band which he has so zealously disciplined and revivified. With the material at his command he has done wonders; no man living could have done more. He has not had simply to travel through the country giving one set of pieces everywhere; but has had adequately to prepare at least twenty different programmes, and has often been too liberal and given us too full a meal. But, however competent a chief may be, he must have efficient assistance; and the pecuniary success of the past two seasons, coupled with the encouragement which his audience has never stinted, should lead to a strengthening of the strings of the band and to the surmounting of any difficulty which may arise whenever inevitable questions as to the provision of extra aid present themselves. Further, the conductor wisely upholds the dignity of those who respond to his baton, and claims the same respect for his band—which really forms the great attraction—that is yielded to every soloist, instrumental or vocal. As one instance of his boldness in taking upon himself due responsibility, I may allude to the Christmas performances of "The Messiah," when Mr. Cowen refused to commence the prelude to "Comfort ye" until the late-comers were seated. In past years the onus has been shirked by the conductor and thrown upon the singer. The choral nights, too, have had more attention than of old; and Mr. Wilson's preparation of his choir, together with a resolute weeding out of incompetent members, has led to more than one performance of striking merit, notably that of "Elijah." In connection with choirs, it is impossible to pass over without remark the growing ability and sonority of Mr. Lane's Philharmonic Society; for a lack of sympathy with oratorio had greatly lessened our opportunities of listening to those massive choral works which are, and ever will be, so dear to Englishmen.

Next in interest to the increasing popularity of orchestral music is our delight in the enthusiasm with which the efforts of Mr. Brodsky, at the Concert Hall, and of Mr. Fuchs, at the Schiller Anstalt and elsewhere, have been greeted. So many attempts have been made to create here a circle of lovers of chamber music that the instant response made to recent efforts has been as surprising as gratifying. During many years heavy losses have attended all endeavours, and no one could have expected so great a change as has enabled Mr. Brodsky each season to hand over to the Royal College a substantial sum (and this year close upon £100), to be devoted to aiding the poorer and more promising students to continue their pupilage.

It has not been through lack of sympathy that more frequent reference has not been made to the regular Saturday evening recitals at the Town Hall by Mr. Pyne, the Corporation and Cathedral organist. In no city have the audiences at such gatherings been larger or more intelligent. Dr. Watson's vocal society retains its popularity and continues to present that unaccompanied choral music which requires careful finish and due variety of expression, but which, through the growing indisposition of amateurs to submit to regular and frequent practice, we now so seldom hear.

The annual record of the doings of the Royal Manchester College of Music must be deferred till the close of the Summer session, but there is no doubt of its being as hopeful and gratifying as any part of the foregoing report.

MUSIC IN NORTHUMBERLAND AND DURHAM.

The performance of Edward Elgar's "King Olaf," by the Newcastle and Gateshead Choral Union, on March 31, briefly referred to last month, was a great success in every way. The work itself is undoubtedly one that improves upon acquaintance, and its performance on this occasion was adequate in every respect, the most conspicuous feature being the admirable singing of the large chorus of 400 voices. Evidently much care and attention had been bestowed upon the preparation of the work so far as the choir was concerned, and much credit is due to Mr. James M. Preston, the conductor, for the successful result of his labours in this respect. It is, perhaps, too much to expect equally successful results from the orchestra at these and other similar concerts, as the performers are gathered together from all parts of the Northern counties and have to manage as best they can with a single rehearsal. Nevertheless, it is remarkable what excellent results are obtained under such circumstances, and very much to the credit of all concerned. The principal vocalists were Madame Marie Duma, Mr. James Leyland, and Mr. Albert Archdeacon, all of whom acquitted themselves most satisfactorily. In bringing forward such works as "King Olaf" the Choral Union is doing a service of inestimable value to the cause of music in this locality, and the action of the committee and the discrimination shown in this respect cannot be too highly commended.

Very successful also was the performance of Gounod's "Redemption" in the Royal Assembly Hall, South Shields, by the South Shields Choral Society, on March 30. Much disappointment was experienced by the absence, owing to indisposition, of Mr. Watkin Mills, who was to have sung the part of the Base Narrator, but his place was most ably filled at very short notice by Mr. W. Tone Allen, a member of the Society. The chorus and orchestra, numbering in all about 200 performers, did excellent service; but the chief honours of the evening fell to Madame Marie Duma, whose singing of the beautiful soprano solos "From Thy love as a Father" and "Lovely appear" was beyond all praise. Mr. James Leyland also gave a satisfactory account of the tenor music. Miss A. Smith presided at the organ and Mr. M. Fairs conducted. This concert brought the Society's fourteenth season to an end. During the fourteen years of its existence it has been the means of introducing to the people of South Shields a large number of important standard and modern works for voices and orchestra, to the great advantage of music generally.

Sterndale Bennett's "Woman of Samaria" was performed with admirable effect at St. Thomas's Church, Sunderland, on Good Friday, by the choir, with a little outside assistance in the solo parts. Mr. George F. Vincent, the organist of the church, presided at the organ.

Rossini's "Stabat Mater" was sung at St. Michael's Church, Newcastle, on Palm Sunday, and Stainer's "Crucifixion" was heard in several churches in this locality during Holy Week. At the Cathedral, Newcastle, Haydn's "Passion" music was given, with Mr. Jeffries at the organ, and at Elswick Road Wesleyan Chapel there was a performance of Gounod's "Redemption."

MUSIC IN NOTTINGHAM.

Dvorák's "Stabat Mater" and Mendelssohn's "Lobgesang" were performed at the concluding concert of the Sacred Harmonic Society, under the direction of Mr. Henry J. Wood. The former work had not been heard in this city before. Mr. Wood's zealous direction of the rehearsals bore good fruit at the performance, resulting in a balance and tone in the chorus which were most creditable to the Society and its conductor. The soloists were Madame Marie Duma, Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. Hirwen Jones, and Mr. Dan Price. In the symphony to "Lobgesang" the orchestra repaid Mr. Wood's insistence on extra rehearsals with a truly brilliant rendering.

The indisposition of Mr. Willy Hess caused the postponement of Miss Cantelo's last classical concert to March 28 and the engagement of Señor Arbos, Mr. J. Holme, and Mr. Whitehouse, who, with Miss Cantelo at the pianoforte, made a strong combination. The programme included Mendelssohn's C minor Trio, Schumann's Pianoforte Quartet (Op. 47), Rubinstein's Sonata (Op. 18) for violoncello and pianoforte, and Christian Sinding's Sonata (Op. 27) for violin and pianoforte. The latter is little known here, and as rendered by Señor Arbos and Miss Cantelo received every mark of appreciation. Mr. Whitehouse is an established favourite here, and his playing of Rubinstein's well-known sonata was much enjoyed.

Messrs. G. Ellenberger and Edwin Thorpe's chamber concerts are well established, and their concluding concert, on March 31, will keep alive anticipation of next season's work. The pianist was Miss Ellenberger, and with Mr. Thorpe she gave a very artistic rendering of Beethoven's Sonata in G minor for violoncello and pianoforte. Her solos were Prelude, Impromptu, and Etude by Chopin; Dvorák's "Dumky" Trio (Op. 90), given for the first time a few months ago, was repeated, with signs of growing appreciation on the part of the audience of this remarkable and fascinating work. Mr. Ellenberger's violin solos were the Adagio (arranged from the Suite in D) by Bach and some Germanic Dances by Kreuz, which were much enjoyed.

MUSIC IN SHEFFIELD AND DISTRICT.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Good Friday musical performances have become quite an institution in Sheffield and the surrounding district, the number this year having been considerably in excess of last year's record. Stainer's "Crucifixion" appears to be the most popular work, its high musical worth and the appropriate character of the theme rendering it particularly suitable for Good Friday representations.

"The Crucifixion" was performed on Good Friday by the Ranmoor Vocal Society, under Mr. J. C. V. Stacey; at St. Paul's Church, Sheffield, under Mr. J. W. Renshaw; at Ebenezer Wesleyan Chapel, Sheffield, and at Eyam, Derbyshire, under Mr. J. W. Froggatt.

The Passion music from Benedict's "St. Peter" was sung at St. Philip's Church, under the direction of Mr. J. Beaumont. The beautiful and appropriate music was performed by the choir of the church with much devotional feeling and expression.

On the same day, Good Friday, the Attercliffe Zion Choral Society gave "Elijah," with a chorus of about 100 voices. Mr. W. W. Chisholm conducted, and an adequate performance of the oratorio was the result. The principals were Madame Norledge, Miss Whitehead, Mr. M. Tomlinson, and Mr. Alfred Shaw. Mr. G. Kitching led the band and Mr. J. A. Rodgers was organist.

Maunder's "Penitence, Pardon, and Peace" was also performed at St. Mark's Church, Sheffield, and at the Wesley Chapel, Fulwood.

The Brincliffe Musical Society gave the closing concert of a successful season on the 15th ult. The novelty of the programme was Mackenzie's music to "The Little Minister," which was admirably played and warmly received. Works by Berlioz, Mendelssohn, Weber, and Sullivan completed the programme. Mr. J. H. Parkes conducted.

"Elijah" was performed, on the 19th ult., by the Sheffield Choral Union, under Mr. S. Suckley. The principals were Mrs. Marshall, Miss Amy Skerritt, Mr. Hirwen Thomas, and Mr. T. C. Fagg. Mr. J. H. Parkes led the band and Mr. Clough was organist. This excellent Society always makes a feature of its chorus-singing, and in Mendelssohn's work the members did both the music and themselves ample justice. In view of so pronounced a success in oratorio, it is to be hoped the committee will decide upon similar works at the Society's concerts next season.

Gadsby's "Lord of the Isles" was performed on the 21st ult., by the St. Peter's (Abbeydale) Choral Society, under the direction of Mr. Wm. Gadsby.

MUSIC IN YORKSHIRE.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Concert-giving seems to be a practical impossibility, so far at least as the West Riding is concerned, after Eastertide. One result of this is that during the fortnight before the holidays there has been at Leeds an unusual quantity of music. A considerable proportion of this has been connected with the penitential season of Lent, which is now more and more observed by special services in our churches, at which works appropriate to the time are given. The Leeds Parish Church has been a pioneer in this respect, as in many others, and two of its many extra Lenten services have been of a specially musical character. On March 21 Bach's "Passion" (according to St. Matthew) was given, following a precedent that has obtained for many years past. The singing of the chorales was perhaps the most striking feature in the performance, in which Master G. Parker (a clever choir boy), Miss Edna Thornton, Mr. Brearley, Mr. Browning, and Mr. Kennedy were the principals; Mr. Ivor Atkins, the recently appointed organist at Worcester, representing the orchestra, and Mr. Alfred Benton conducting. On the 4th ult. Dvorák's "Stabat Mater" was the work given. On this occasion a full orchestra was employed, which had this absurd result, that the splendid organ belonging to the church, being tuned to the normal diapason, must be silenced, and a very inferior substitute of the American variety employed. Certainly the Parish Church will benefit by the general adoption of the lower pitch, though the theory that a sudden change of pitch affects a choir for the worse is strikingly refuted by the equal excellence of the chorus singing at these services, whether at the low pitch in Bach or the higher one in Dvorák. The principals in a performance of uncommon all-round excellence were Miss Ada Beecroft, Miss Isa Frood, Messrs. Brearley and Browning, with Mr. Alfred Benton as the conductor. On the 1st ult. a very interesting revival of Graun's Passion music took place at St. Chad's Church, near Leeds. Here again the material was entirely home-made; the principals, Master John Hall—a remarkably capable treble, by the way—Messrs. Gaunt, Barnes, and Knowles, as well as the chorus, being simply members of the ordinary choir. That they were equal to their task was evidenced by a very smooth performance indeed, with which Mr. H. Percy Richardson's sympathetic accompaniment on the organ had much to do. C. L. Williams's cantata "Gethsemane" was the subject of a similar service at Emmanuel Church, and indeed, from the three Yorkshire Cathedrals of York, Ripon, and Wakefield, to the more ambitious parish churches in the dioceses, there have been many such musical recognitions of the season.

On March 23 a very fine and peculiarly sympathetic performance of Brahms's "German" Requiem was given, under Dr. Stanford's conductorship, at one of the Leeds Philharmonic and Leeds Subscription joint-concerts. It was followed by Dr. Parry's setting of Pope's "Ode for St. Cecilia's Day," written, it will be remembered, for the Leeds Festival of 1889. It was sung with vigour and expression under the composer's conductorship, and only lacked a little steadiness and restraint in the matter of speed to be quite first-rate. The principals, both excellent, were Miss Palliser and Mr. Kennerley Rumford. On March 29 the Leeds Symphony Society gave a concert. Though an amateur body, considerable musicianship was shown in a programme which included Beethoven's First Symphony, one of Mozart's pianoforte concertos (with Mr. C. Wilkinson as pianist), and overtures by Max Bruch, Sterndale Bennett, and Gounod. Mr. Elliott was both leader and solo violinist, and Mr. A. E. Grimshaw conducted very ably. Mr. Grimshaw and Mr. Bernard Johnson gave, on the 6th ult., at the Public Art Gallery, a recital of music for two pianofortes that had the interest of novelty, apart from its intrinsic merits. They played in thoroughly musicianly fashion pieces by Mozart, Schumann, Liszt, and Saint-Saëns; Miss Enid Grimshaw varying the programme pleasantly with her songs. During Easter week the Leeds Amateur Operatic Society gave a musical entertainment of a less exacting description in the shape of "Falka," which they played to crowded audiences at the Grand Theatre. The cast was efficient, and easily fulfilled the small histrionic demands of comic opera; but the main features of the production were the good chorus-singing and the excellent ensemble, for which the conductor, Mr. Waithman, and the stage manager, Mr. R. P. Oglesby, were severally responsible.

At Bradford the last flicker of the musical season took place on March 25, when Gounod's "Redemption" was given by the Festival Choral Society. Miss Agnes Nicholls, Miss Florence Oliver, Mrs. Powell, Messrs. Sandbrook, Leyland, and Uttley were the principals in a good performance, conducted by Mr. F. H. Cowen with his usual ability and even more than his usual energy. At Huddersfield, on March 22, the Subscription Concerts came to an end, the fine band of the Grenadier Guards supplying a programme of more artistic character than is usually associated with military bands. A highly interesting revival of Handel's seldom-heard oratorio "Jephtha" took place at Pudsey, on March 28, under Mr. Jowett's direction. The principals were Madame Sadler-Fogg, Miss Frood, Mrs. Ramsden, Mr. Brearley, and Mr. Riley, who were one and all most capable, while the pluck and vigour of the chorus deserved great praise. The band was, as usual, the weak place. On March 22 the Keighley Musical Union gave "Elijah," Mr. Benton being the conductor, and Miss Maggie Davies, Miss Alice Richardson, and Messrs. Kellett and Andrew Black the principals. At Harrogate, Mr. Zeldenrust appeared at one of Messrs. Haddock's musical evenings on March 21, while on the 31st an exceptionally interesting programme was offered at the last of Messrs. Naylor and Gutfeld's chamber concerts. Mr. Herbert Parsons gave a remarkably fine interpretation of Liszt's Pianoforte Sonata in B minor, and a violin sonata by César Franck and some variations for two pianofortes by Sinding were among the special features of the concert. One of Mr. and Mrs. Henschel's vocal recitals afforded an evening of the purest enjoyment at the final subscription concert at Wakefield on March 24.

Though the musical products of the North and East Ridings are far below those of the more populous and more vocally inclined West Riding, there is something to be recorded of their doings, and still more is promised in the near future. "Elijah" was given by the York Musical Society on March 29, under Canon Hudson's conductorship. The title-rôle was taken by Mr. A. H. Gee, the other principals being Miss Gertrude Hughes, Miss Hannah Jones, and Mr. Gwilym Richards. The Hull Vocal Society, of which Dr. G. H. Smith is the conductor, gave, on the same date, Dvorák's "Stabat Mater," which has had a singular vogue in Yorkshire since it was given at the Leeds Festival of 1895, indicating that even the best music can make its way into popular esteem if only time be allowed it. With it were associated Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony and Mendelssohn's "Hear my Prayer," and the principals were Miss Alice Simons, Miss Muriel Foster, Mr. C. Ellison, and Mr. A. F. Ferguson. At Scarborough, the Choral Union, with the help of fifty voices from the Leeds Philharmonic Society, gave "Elijah" on Easter Monday, the chief soloists being Madame Goodall, Miss E. Thornton, Messrs. Brearley and Thornton, with Mr. Pitcher as conductor. The Whitby Choral Society gave Gade's "Crusaders," under Mr. Hallgate's conductorship, on March 30, with Miss Moorhouse, Mr. Reed, and Mr. Thornton as principals, and a band of more than usual dimensions, though incomplete in both wood and brass. But it is not surprising that a difficulty felt in the large West Riding towns should be accentuated in less populous places.

The Bridlington Festival, the most important Yorkshire event of the past month, which took place too late for notice in this number, is to be succeeded, on June 28 and 29, by the eighth of the musical festivals held in the little North Riding village of Hovingham. Brahms's "German" Requiem, Part I. of the "Creation," and Stanford's "Revenge" are the choral works to be given. But of even greater interest will be the appearance of Dr. Joachim, who has accepted Canon Hudson's invitation to be present, and will play the Beethoven Concerto and the Bach Chaconne. Miss Agnes Nicholls, Mrs. Burrell, Mr. J. Reed, Mr. Francis Harford, and Mr. Plunket Greene are the vocalists engaged, and Mr. Leonard Borwick will, as on several former occasions, be the solo pianist. He has chosen for his principal pieces Schumann's Introduction and Allegro Appassionata and a Mozart Concerto, the beautiful work in A major, composed in 1786. An exacting programme truly, yet the experience of former festivals under Canon Hudson's conductorship shows that it is not over-ambitious.

The good work done by Miss Wakefield at the Kendal competitions and festivals has provoked copies, and avowed imitations have been planned for two Yorkshire districts. One of these has already been started at York, on the 25th and 26th ult., too late for notice in the present issue. Prizes were offered for schools, large and small, for string quartet parties, for choral societies of both towns and villages, for male voices, female voices, and mixed choirs. Sight singing by soloists was also among the competitions, and, in the event of the meeting being deemed successful enough to call for a repetition, as it is to be hoped it may, this feature will no doubt be extended to the choral competitors. At Leyburn, in picturesque Wensleydale, a similar "Tournament of Song" is to be held on the 28th inst., organised by the Hon. Lucien Orde-Powlett and a local committee. There will be classes for madrigals, anthems, quartets, children's choirs, solo sight singing, violin solos, and string quartets, so that the musicianship of the district will be thoroughly tested.

MUSIC IN PARIS.

(From our own Correspondent.)

M. Massenet's "Thaïs" was revived on the 13th ult., at the Opéra, with a new ballet and an entire tableau added by the composer for the occasion. The ballet, a well written piece constructed on traditional lines, afforded an opportunity to Mesdames Zambelli, Robin Régnier, and

Digitized by Google

Mendès for the display of their talents; the last-named lady taking part in the capacity of singer as well as of an admired danseuse. The new tableau includes a charming duet, which was rendered with admirable effect by Mdlle. Berthet and M. Delmas. The next novelty here will be M. Rousseau's "La Cloche du Rhin," the première of which may be expected very shortly. Madame Flahaut, of the Liège Conservatoire, has been engaged at the Opéra for two years.

At the Opéra Comique the first representation took place, on March 23, of "l'Ile du Rêve," described as an "idylle polynésienne," in three acts, the libretto from the pens of MM. A. Alexandre and G. Hartmann, the music by M. Reynaldo Hahn. The subject of this new work is taken from M. Loti's celebrated novel "Le Mariage," with its delicious exotic atmosphere pervading it; but the almost complete absence of the dramatic element in this work could not fail to make itself seriously felt on the stage. The result was a series of tableaux, to which the composer has furnished some very graceful and frequently, indeed, charming music, while the effect, on the whole, was somewhat monotonous—a fact for which the composer is scarcely to blame. The interpretation of the work was an excellent one, and the principal singers, Mdlle. Guiraudon and M. Clément, as well as Mesdames de l'Isle and Bernaert, and M. Belhomme, were greatly applauded. On the same evening there was a most successful revival of "Le Roi l'a dit," by Délibes, M. Danbé conducting for the last time on this occasion, previous to his retirement. M. Vincent d'Indy's "Fervaal" will be the next novelty here.

There has been quite a series of appearances of foreign artists at the Lamoureux concerts during the last few weeks. On March 20 Madame Gorlenko-Dolina, a Russian vocalist of considerable talent, interpreted a "Chanson de Berger" by Rimsky-Korsakoff and airs by Glinka and Solovieff with excellent effect. The same concert included the first performance of a symphonic poem founded upon a Flemish legend, and entitled "Sire Halewyn," by M. Tiersot; a well written work, albeit somewhat wanting in individuality. Herr Mottl was the highly successful conductor of the concert of March 27, in which Madame Mottl likewise took part, sharing the applause with her husband in her interpretation of fragments from Berlioz's "Roméo et Juliette," Schubert's "Thekla," and airs from "Le Drac," by MM. P. and L. Hillemacher, brought out some time since by Herr Mottl at Carlsruhe, but as yet unknown in the composer's native France. At the concert of the 3rd ult. M. César Thomson was the solo violinist, and greatly delighted his audience by his rendering of Goldmark's Concerto, the Adagio by Bruch, and a Passacaglia on a Handelian theme. M. Risler, the well-known pianist, also took part in this concert; and in that given on Good Friday M. van Dyck re-appeared with much success.

There was a very fine performance of M. Saint-Saëns's "Le Deluge" at the Colonne concert of March 20, with Mesdames Raunay and Planès, MM. Cazeneuve and Challet in the solo parts. "La Mort d'Adonis," by M. Leroux, an important work, already successfully produced last year at one of the Opéra concerts, was the principal number of the concert of March 27, Madame Heglon scoring a great success on this occasion. The concert of the 3rd ult., under the direction of Dr. Hans Richter, became the occasion of a series of enthusiastic demonstrations in favour of that eminent musician, who conducted a number of well-known works.

The Russian concerts given by Madame Gorlenko-Dolina have been a highly interesting feature in recent musical events here, and have greatly enhanced the reputation previously acquired by this excellent artist. At the concert given by her on March 24 the lady sang, amongst other numbers, "Cordelia's Romance," by Solovieff, and excerpts from "Roussalka," by Dargomisky, the performances also including a Suite Arménienne by Kosatchenko, who ably conducted the orchestra, and which was very favourably received. The concert given by the Russian artist on the 6th ult. was devoted chiefly to compositions by Tschaikowsky. M. Auer, the eminent Russian violinist, was the conductor, who, after an admirable reading of the Symphonie Pathétique on the part of the orchestra under his direction, played in truly superb style the Violin Concerto in D by the same composer. A perfect ovation was accorded to the concert-giver after her rendering, with exquisite grace and refinement, of Borodine's air "Dans ton pays si plein de charme," as well as of several songs by César Cui and the Grand Duke Constantine, written to words by Victor Hugo.

Amongst the number of concerts of chamber music may be specially instanced those given by M. and Madame Weingaertner, the interesting recitals of the Norwegian vocalist, Madame Hanka Schjelderup, as well as the remarkable séances of M. Paul Viardot, the celebrated violin virtuoso.

M. Saint-Saëns has returned to Paris from his sojourn abroad, having brought with him the completed score of his new opera "Dejanire."

Particulars have come to hand of the interesting musical festival to be held at Bergen, during the week from June 27 to July 3 next, in connection with the International Exhibition taking place this summer at the little Norwegian town. There will be six grand concert performances of choral and orchestral works, and solo numbers with orchestra, the great majority of them by living Norwegian composers, who will conduct their respective works. The programmes include the Symphony in B flat major, the Norwegian Rhapsody in C, and string quartets by Johann Svendsen; the Pianoforte Concerto in A minor, scenes from "Olav Trygvason" for soli, chorus, and orchestra, and songs with orchestral accompaniment by Edvard Grieg, as well as important compositions by Johan Selmer, Christian Sinding, Ole Olsen, Iver Holter, Schjelderup, and others. The orchestra will be that of the Concertgebouw, of Amsterdam, and the choral forces will be supplied by the united choral societies of Bergen. Amongst the soloists will be Mesdames Ellen Gulbranson, Gmür-Harloff, and Lie Nissen; Herren Lammers and Schjött.

The draft programme of the forthcoming Leeds Triennial Musical Festival (October 5-8) has been issued. The following are the chief works to be performed: "Elijah," Mendelssohn; suite, Tschaïkowsky; pianoforte concerto, Schumann; "Stabat Mater," Palestrina; Symphony in D (Prague), Mozart; "Blest Pair of Sirens," Hubert Parry; Symphony in C (No. 9), Schubert; "Alexander's Feast," Handel; the Choral Symphony, Beethoven; and a Wagner selection. In addition to the above compositions, the following novelties, written for the festival, are also announced: Cantata, "Caractacus," Edward Elgar; Te Deum, Stanford; sacred ode, "The foe behind, the deep before," Alan Gray; symphonic poem, Humperdinck; and a new cantata by Sir Arthur Sullivan, who, as usual, is the Conductor of the festival.

The Duke of Cambridge presided at the 106th anniversary festival of the Royal Society of Musicians, at the Hôtel Métropole, on the 23rd ult. The chairman, in proposing the toast of the evening, said that as a Jubilee offering it was decided to double all the allowances. This had absorbed £7,000 of the capital, and therefore he asked his hearers to be more liberal than perhaps they had intended to be. During the evening the hon. treasurer announced subscriptions amounting to over £700. The artists who assisted gratuitously in the musical programme were Miss Alice Esty, Miss Lucie Johnstone, Mr. Walter Coward, Mr. Edward Branscombe, Mr. Albert James, Mr. Edward Dalzell, and Mr. Robert Hilton; Herr Liebling (pianoforte) and Mr. Henry Such (violin). Mr. Fountain Meen was the accompanist.

The Chaplin Trio effectively displayed their abilities as instrumentalists at St. James's Hall on the 21st ult. Miss Nellie Chaplin played neatly and with abundant character a group of pianoforte pieces, varying in style, by Rubinstein, Schutt, and Oleson, and Miss Mabel Chaplin's taste and facility of execution as a violoncellist found scope in a sonata by Marcello and in German's "Souvenir" and "Bolero." Miss Kate Chaplin, the violinist, was heard to great advantage in Max Bruch's Concerto in D minor. The clever young artists afterwards joined in a spirited performance of Tschaïkowsky's imposing Trio (Op. 50). The instrumental works were interspersed with songs contributed by Mr. Franklin Clive, who, by general desire, repeated Mr. R. H. Walthew's "El Dorado," the composer accompanying.

Mr. J. S. Shedlock gave three lectures on the Structure and Meaning of the Music of Wagner's "Der Ring des Nibelungen," at 20, Stratford Place, on March 28 and the 4th ult., by kind permission of Mrs. H. M. Cooke. The lecturer described and illustrated upon the pianoforte the principal themes, grouping them so as to assist the memory. He also gave illustrations showing various modifications of these themes and the way in which they were developed. "Nearly everyone," he remarked, "was aware that Wagner used representative themes, but only those who had studied the score understood the truth of Wagner's declaration that nearly the whole of the music of the 'Ring' was evolved from them." These lectures, which were well attended, will be repeated, by kind permission of Mrs. E. Garrett Anderson, M.D., at 4, Upper Berkeley Street, on the afternoons of the 9th, 12th, and 16th inst., at five o'clock.

The Royal Opera will open its season on the 9th inst. The season's complete repertory is as follows: in Italian—"Die Meistersinger," "Don Giovanni," "Figaro," "Gli Ugonotti," "Aïda," "Traviata," "Trovatore," Mancinelli's "Ero e Leandro," "Barbiere di Siviglia," Boïto's "Mefistofele," "Lucia di Lammermoor," "Cavalleria Rusticana," "Pagliacci," and "Rigoletto." In French—"Faust," "Roméo et Juliette," "Philémon et Baucis," "Manon," "Les Huguenots," Saint-Saëns's "Henry VIII.," Gluck's "Orphée," "La Navarraise," "Hamlet," and "Carmen." In German—"Lohengrin," "Tannhäuser," "Tristan und Isolde," "Fidelio," and "Der Ring des Nibelungen." The only novelties, or quasi-novelties, therefore announced are Dr. Saint-Saëns's "Henry VIII." and Mancinelli's "Ero e Leandro," already heard as a cantata at the last Norwich Festival.

The Stoke Newington Choral Association closed its season with an eminently creditable performance of the "Hymn of Praise," at Morley Hall, Hackney, on March 28. The executive resources were equal to demands, the chorus and orchestra, over which Mr. Percy Taylor presided, numbering about 150, whilst the principals were Madame Zippora Monteith, Miss Ada Quail (in the duet "I waited for the Lord"), and Mr. William Green.

At the Church of the Annunciation, in Old Quebec Street, was performed, on Good Friday afternoon, a selection from the first act of Wagner's "Parsifal," in a manner that merits record. The part of Amfortas was sung by Mr. Andrew Black, the title-rôle was sustained by Mr. W. Gillard, and Mr. Frederic Hosking delivered the words of Gurnemanz. The organ, which was skilfully played by Mr. Cuthbert Hawley, was supplemented by brass instruments, and the bell motive was played on the specially made machine heard at a recent performance of this section of the work at the Queen's Hall. The "Voices in the Dome" were represented by the choir boys singing from behind the organ.

The Berlin Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy Fund, whereof Dr. Joachim is the president of committee, announces the award to be made this year of two stipends of 1,500 marks each, for composition and executive art respectively, which may be competed for, as in previous years, by former pupils of any one of the State-subventioned German music-teaching institutions, irrespective of age, sex, or nationality. All further particulars may be obtained on application to the Curatorium of the Mendelssohn Stiftung, Potsdamer Strasse, No. 120, Berlin.

In St. Paul's Cathedral, Bach's "Passion Music according to St. Matthew" was, as usual, given on the Tuesday in Holy Week (the 5th ult.), and with all the accustomed solemn effect. The augmented choir, under the conductorship of Sir George Martin, numbered about 250, and the solos were safely entrusted to members of the Cathedral choir. The accompaniments to the recitatives were played on a pianoforte by Mr. Fred. Walker, and Mr. Charles Macpherson was at the organ.

The People's Palace (Mile End) Choral Society, which is doing such good work under the baton of Mr. C. H. Allen Gill, gave a highly creditable performance of "The Messiah" on Good Friday evening, the 8th ult. Misses Ethel Newcombe and Marie Hooton and Messrs. Edward Branscombe and Arthur Barlow were quite equal to their duties as soloists, and Mr. B. Jackson presided at the organ with unfailing tact.

One of the most successful of the many excellent oratorio performances given in Union Chapel, Islington, took place on March 29, when Mendelssohn's "Lauda Sion" and Rossini's "Stabat Mater" were sung. The members of the Psalmody and Choral Class, under the direction of the hon. conductor, Mr. Robert Williamson, sustained the choruses, and the solos were in the safe keeping of Miss Maggie Purvis, Miss Lucie Johnstone, Mr. Herbert Grover, and Mr. Bantock Pierpoint. Mr. Fountain Meen (organist to the chapel) played the accompaniments on Willis's fine instrument in his usual irreproachable manner.

At the recent fourth annual meeting of the Wimbledon Male-Voice Choir it was unanimously resolved that, owing to the large number of present members who are non-resident in Wimbledon, the choir should in future be known as "Mr. Henry W. Weston's Male-Voice Choir." The Society numbers at present nearly forty singing members and has had a most successful season. At the same meeting the members of the choir presented the conductor with a purse of gold and a handsome drawing-room clock, suitably inscribed, as a mark of their esteem.

The second concert of the Ealing Choral Society was held on March 29, when a highly successful performance of Mendelssohn's "Athalie" and Rossini's "Stabat Mater" was given. The soloists were Mdlle. Tietiens, Miss F. Power, Mr. H. Beauchamp, and Mr. H. Webster; Miss F. Hughes and Mr. Hanington also assisting in Mendelssohn's work. There was a full orchestra and chorus of 150 performers, who acquitted themselves admirably. The orchestra was led by Mr. S. Dean Grimson, and Mr. J. Cliffe Forrester conducted.

The annual concert given by the British Museum Rifle Association took place at the headquarters of the corps, Chenies Street, Bedford Square, on the 20th ult., and was attended with its usual success. Amongst the vocalists who took part special mention may be made of Miss Nancy Miller, who contributed two songs with much acceptance; Miss Katie Lewis, Madame Minnie Shatel, Mr. Harrison Brockbank, and Mr. Dyved Lewys. Mr. Martin Jacoby played two violin solos with his accustomed skill, and Mr. Harry Walter accompanied.

An important musical exhibition, the proceeds of which are to go towards the establishment of a fund for the erection of a monument to Wagner in Berlin, is to be opened in that capital on the 7th inst. It will comprise autographs, portraits, and other objects of interest in connection with celebrated musicians, many noted private collectors in different countries having sent contributions. The exhibition will remain open until August 12.

Messrs. Greene and Borwick gave their third vocal and pianoforte recital at St. James's Hall on March 25. Mr. Greene sang a very attractive selection of old and modern songs; and Mr. Borwick gave very fine interpretations of Beethoven's Variations and Fugue in E flat (Op. 35), based on a theme from the last movement of his "Eroica" Symphony, and Liszt's "Etude d'éxecution transcendante" in F minor. Mr. S. Liddle was the accompanist.

Miss Grace Wonnacott, pupil of Professor Klindworth of Berlin, gave a successful pianoforte recital on March 30, at the Athenæum, Camden Road. Miss Wonnacott played Beethoven's Sonata in E flat, Liszt's Ballade in B minor, and Chopin's Scherzo in B minor, the last-named being encored. The recitalist also joined Miss Margaret J. Hollick in sonatas by Mozart and Grieg for pianoforte and violin. Madame Antoinette Sterling was the vocalist.

The conclusion of the article on "The Structure of Instrumental Music," by Mr. W. H. Hadow, is unavoidably held over owing to the unusual pressure upon our space.

Under the patronage of Lord and Lady Cromer, Mr. Edward Kuckey gave a concert, with the assistance of Miss Harriette Thomas, a Welsh lady and pupil of Mr. Shakespeare, at Shepherd's Hotel, Cairo, on March 19. Mr. Kuckey's performances of the Allegretto from Grieg's Sonata in F and Sarasate's "Faust" Fantasie displayed high artistic execution and musical talent. Miss Harriette Thomas gave much satisfaction by the way she rendered some well-selected songs.

An opera, entitled "Phantasie," by Miss Ethel M. Smyth, is to be produced this month at Weimar, under Herr Stavenhagen's direction. A Mass in D by this gifted lady was produced by Sir Joseph Barnby at the Albert Hall some five years ago, and previous to that Mr. Manns performed some of her orchestral works at the Crystal Palace. She is a daughter of General J. H. Smyth, of the Royal Artillery, and pursued her musical studies in London, Leipzig, and Berlin.

The Bohemian String Quartet gave its second concert this season on March 29, at St. James's Hall, in the presence of a numerous and appreciative audience. Excellent interpretations were given of Dvorák's seldom heard Quartet in C (Op. 61), Sgambati's Quartet in C sharp minor (Op. 17), and Haydn's in G minor (Op. 74).

Miss Trixie Barrett announces her second matinée musical, which will take place at the Steinway Hall, Seymour Street, on Monday afternoon, June 6, at three o'clock. Miss Barrett will be assisted by Miss Rasey, Miss Joy Carol, Mr. Herbert Buchanan, Mr. Albert Archdeacon, Miss Muriel Handley (solo violoncello), Mr. Paul Mahlendorff (solo pianoforte), and Mr. Frank Lambart (accompanist).

The resignation of Mr. G. Graham Newstead from the appointment of organist and choirmaster at St. Andrew's, Lambeth, which he has held for seven years, has been marked by several tangible expressions of high appreciation.

Goring Thomas's cantata "The Swan and the Skylark" was performed, on March 26, by the Bow and Bromley Institute Choir, under Dr. McNaught. Miss Edith Hensler, Madame Edith Hands, Mr. Gwilym Richards, and Mr. Frederic Hosking were the soloists, and Miss Gwynne Kimpton led the orchestra. The work was heard with very great satisfaction by the audience.

The original orchestral score of Rossini's opera "Guillaume Tell" has just been acquired for the Library of the Paris Conservatoire. The manuscript was discovered by the well-known collecter, M. Charles Malherbe, in the hands of a second-hand bookseller, and it was bought for the Conservatoire at the very fair price of 7,000 francs, or about £280 sterling.

Mendelssohn's "Hear my Prayer" was performed on the Wednesday in Passion Week at St. Stephen's Church, Poplar, when the solo was expressively sung by Miss Edith Shapland, a pupil of Mr. Godwin Fowles, the organist and choirmaster of the church, who presided at the organ.

Mr. W. H. Eayres, the violinist, who has been laid aside for several weeks owing to severe illness, has, we are glad to say, now recovered, and is able to resume his usual professional engagements. Mr. Eayres is engaged for the approaching Musical Festival at Peterborough.

The Kent section of the Incorporated Society of Musicians invited Dr. W. H. Longhurst to a complimentary luncheon at the Royal Hotel, Ramsgate, on the 16th ult., at which a large number of members were present. Mr. P. V. Henniker was in the chair.

The South Place Ethical Society, Finsbury, gave its twenty-sixth and last concert of the twelfth season on Sunday, the 3rd ult., being the first anniversary of the death of Brahms, when the entire programme was selected from the works of that master.

Signor Alberto Randegger, a nephew of the popular conductor, played with remarkable success a Violin Concerto with orchestra, of his own composition, at a pupils' concert given at the Milan Conservatoire last month.

FOREIGN NOTES.

Amsterdam.—Special performances in memory of Johannes Brahms, extending over three days, were given by the Maatschappy tot Bevordering van Tonkunst, on the 2nd, 3rd, and 4th ult., under the direction of Herr Julius Röntgen. The programme included the "Deutsches Requiem," the Pianoforte Concerto in B flat, the B minor Clarinet Quintet (Op. 115), the Sestet (Op. 18), the Rhapsody (on Goethe's Harz-Reise), the "Triumphlied," and a number of minor vocal pieces. Amongst the soloists were Mesdames Noordwier-Reddinguis, Marie Brema, and Julia Uzielli, Herren Joh. Messchaert, Mengelberg, Mühlfeld, and others. The undertaking was most successful in every way.

Berlin.—The long-expected first performance of Herr August Bungert's "Odysseus," at the Royal Opera, took place on March 31, in the presence of a large audience, who received the work with every mark of favour and repeatedly recalled the composer. In marked contrast with the popular verdict have been the critical voices in the press, by whom the advent of this new post-composer of tetralogies, who, moreover, intends to erect a theatre of his own for their production, is by no means hailed with delight. The work was admirably mounted, and the performance, under the direction of Capellmeister Schalk, of Prague, specially engaged for the occasion, was an excellent one. Herr Kienzl's "Don Quixote" and Tschaïkowsky's "Yolanthe" will be the next novelties at the Royal Opera.——A number of compositions by Herr Arnold Mendelssohn, a relative of the immortal Felix, formed the programme of a concert given here last month by Herr Nodnagel, with the co-operation of Professor Schmidt-Köhne and Dr. Ludwig Wüllner. They consisted of excerpts from the music-dramas "Elsi" and "Der Bärenhäuter" and a cycle of songs, all of which proved highly effective and are welcomed by many competent critics as being replete with individuality, imaginative qualities, and thorough musicianlike workmanship.——Under the curious title of "Fafner-Bund," an association has just been formed here for the purpose of producing new works by native composers, which otherwise would have but small chance of obtaining a hearing. The connection of the new Society with the familiar "Wurm" in Wagner's tetralogy is not very apparent.——Herr Schalk has been definitely appointed to a conductorship at the Royal Opera.

Bremen.—A new opera, "Die Braut von Cypern," by Herr G. Kulenkampff, was brought out at the Stadt-Theater on the 1st ult., and very favourably received, the composer being recalled many times.——At the seventh Philharmonic concert of the season, on the 3rd ult., a new orchestral suite entitled "Carnaval," by the conductor, Herr Georg Schumann, was produced for the first time and proved a highly picturesque, humorous, and interesting work.

Brussels.—M. Eugène Ysaÿe has, it is stated, sent in his resignation as professor at the Conservatoire, and will succeed the late Anton Seidl at New York. The eminent violinist's successor at the Conservatoire will probably be M. César Thompson.——Herr Weingartner was the conductor of the fifth subscription concert of the Ysaÿe orchestra last month, and met with a most enthusiastic reception both in his capacity of conductor and composer.——At the Théâtre de la Monnaie, Miss Brema has been immensely applauded in the part of Dalila in M. Saint-Saëns's "Samson et Dalila," and has signed a fresh engagement for next season. The one hundredth performance of Massenet's "Herodiade" was recorded here on the 2nd ult.

Budapest.—A new opera in two acts, entitled "Ninon," by the Hungarian composer Eugene Stoganovitz, was brought out at the National Theatre on March 27, and very well received, notwithstanding the somewhat banal subject of the libretto. At a concert given by the Liszt Society, on the 6th ult., the first performance took place of several new chamber compositions by Zabados, Horvath, and Dohnanyi (the latter only fourteen years of age), which were considered highly satisfactory examples of talent existing in the ranks of the younger generation of native composers.

Christiania.—A new one-act opera, entitled "Silvio," the libretto of which purports to be a sequel to "Cavalleria Rusticana," by the Norwegian composer Guston Borg, has been produced with great success at the Royal Opera.

COLOGNE.—The production of both parts of Berlioz's "Les Troyens," on March 30 and 31, at the Stadt-Theater, was an event of considerable artistic importance, the first complete performance of the work on any stage having been given some years ago at Carlsruhe, under Herr Mottl's direction, since which time "Les Troyens" has only been produced on one or two occasions at Paris and at Munich. The difficult work had been most carefully prepared, under Professor Kleffel's direction, and both the choruses and solo parts were excellently rendered, amongst the latter Frau Pester-Prosky, in the rôle of Dido, being especially admired.

FLORENCE.—Considerable success was achieved on March 28, at the Teatro Pagliano, by a new one-act "pastoral episode" entitled "Nemea," of which Signor Ernesto Coop is the composer. There are only three solo parts in the piece, which is interpolated with choruses and dances, all of which proved highly effective.

FRANKFORT-ON-MAIN.—Herr Richard Strauss conducted his new symphonic poem "Don Quixote" at the eleventh subscription concert of the Museum last month, with a success which far exceeded that achieved by the work on its recent first performance at Cologne. Herr Hugo Becker was the interpreter of the violoncello solo part, which forms an important feature in the score.

HAMBURG.—The well-known Hamburg Bach-Verein, which has rendered excellent service in the cultivation of oratorio in this town, and which has been associated with the late Hans von Bülow's memorable performances of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, has been dissolved. The Society gave its final concert on March 22, the twenty-fifth anniversary of its foundation, when a Missa Solemnis was produced from the pen of Herr Adolph Mehrkens, who had been the conductor from its beginning.

LEIPZIG.—The new opera, "Das Unmöglichste," by Herr Anton Urspruch, one of the senior professors at the Raff Conservatorium, Frankfort, was very well received on its first production here on March 29. Herr Urspruch has already become favourably known as a dramatic composer by an opera "Der Sturm," after Shakespeare's "The Tempest."——The well known musician and theoretical author, Dr. Johannes Merkel, has accepted a professorship at the Conservatorium. Herr Fritz von Bose, of Carlsruhe, has also taken over a pianoforte class at the same Institution. Herr Zöllner, for some years past conductor of the New York "Liederkranz," has been appointed to the conductorship of the University Choral Society in the room of Dr. Kretzschmar, resigned.

LINZ (AUSTRIA).—Under the auspices of the Linz Municipality, an Anton Bruckner Fund has been established for the purpose of giving biennial performances here of the Viennese master's works. The first of these took place on March 20, under Herr August Göllerich's direction, and created an amount of enthusiasm far exceeding any appreciation of the master's works during his lifetime. The works produced were the Symphony, No. 1, in C minor; the "Ave Maria" for mixed choir à capella, and the Grand Mass in F minor for soli, chorus, and orchestra.

MADRID.—The opera "Il Gladiatore," which obtained the first prize in the competition recently opened in Italy by M. Steiner, was produced at the Royal Theatre on March 21, with success. The composer, Signor Orefice, is one of the most talented pupils of Signor Mancinelli.——Wagner's "Das Liebesmahl der Apostel" is shortly to be produced, for the first time here, by the Sociedad de Conciertos, under Señor Gimenez's direction.

MILAN.—The Società Orchestrale opened its twentieth concert season on March 27, amongst the principal works in the programme being Svendsen's Symphony in D, the Overture to Reinecke's "King Manfred," and the "Liebestod" from "Tristan und Isolde." Signor Mascagni, who directed the performance, will be the conductor throughout the season.——Signor Verdi will, it is announced in Italian journals, shortly take up his residence in this town. The veteran composer, whose sojourn at Sant' Agata has been rendered painful by the recent death of his wife, will reside at the Hôtel de Milan, in the apartments long since named after him by the proprietor of that establishment.——At the Teatro Lirico the first performance took place, on the 2nd ult., of a three-act opera, "Hedda," by the French composer, M. Fernand Le Borne. The libretto, rendered in Italian by Signor Amintore Galli, is a sort of paraphrase of the well-known poetic legends of "Melusine" and "Loreley," and proved not ineffective, while the music found many admirers. The composer conducted.

MUNICH.—The first performance took place, on March 29, at the Royal Theatre, of an opera, "Der tolle Eberstein," by Herr Arthur Koennemann, with considerable success. This is one of the three operatic works which obtained a prize in the competition instituted last year under the auspices of the Prince Regent of Bavaria, and the last to be performed, all of them having proved successful and having been accepted for performance at other German theatres. The fact is certainly a somewhat remarkable one and speaks well for the discernment of the jury.——Following up the model performances of Mozart's maturer operatic works given in recent years at the Residenz Theater, Herr von Possart, the excellent Intendant of the Royal theatres, is now engaged in the mounting of the charming earlier works of the master—viz., "Der Schauspiel-Director" and "La Finta Giardiniera." These will be produced entirely in accordance with the original scores, and their respective librettos are being carefully revised by Dr. Kolbeck. At the Akademie concert of March 24 Dvorák's symphonic poem "Der Wassermann" was produced for the first time here, under the direction of Court Capellmeister Erdmannsdörfer, and received with high favour, its picturesque instrumentation and the characteristic local colour imparted to the legend being especially remarked upon by the press organs. In the same concert a new violin concerto by Herr Miroslav Weber, admirably played by the composer, was heard for the first time and proved a distinctly valuable addition to the literature of the instrument for which, as might have been expected, it is moreover exceedingly well written. Madame Jessel (of Frankfort) introduced a number of chamber compositions and songs of her own composition at a concert given by the lady on the 5th ult.

TOULOUSE.—A successful performance took place last month, at the Municipal Theatre here, of an opera in four acts entitled "Jessica," the libretto founded upon Shakespeare's "The Merchant of Venice." The composer, M. Louis Deffès, director of the Toulouse Conservatoire, was almost overwhelmed with plaudits at the conclusion of an excellent performance.

VENICE.—The remarkable oratorio "The Transfiguration," recently produced for the first time in connection with the Milan Congress of Church Music, has been performed here no less than six times during the last few weeks, with enormous and ever-increasing success. The composer, the young Abbé Lorenzo Perosi, who conducted, has had numerous applications for the production of the work in various parts of Italy.

VERVIERS.—A new opera, "Hermann et Dorothée," the libretto founded upon Goethe's well-known poem, the music by M. Le Rey, was brought out here on March 28 with much success. The composer is a pupil of Léo Délibes.

VIENNA.—The committee charged with the erection, in this capital, of a monument to Johannes Brahms have just issued a very dignified and earnest appeal to all lovers of the deceased composer for the support of the undertaking. A concert devoted to this object was given, on the 3rd ult., by Madame Alice Barbi, when a number of Brahms's Lieder were most admirably rendered by that gifted vocalist.——Herr Carl Goldmark has been appointed to the chair vacated by the death of Brahms in the directorate of the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde.——Herr Gottfried Preyer, the worthy Capellmeister of St. Stephen's Cathedral, celebrated his ninety-first birthday last month in excellent health and spirits. He was born at Hausbrunn, in Lower Austria, in 1807.

WEIMAR.—The seventh Philharmonic concert of the season, on March 25, was conducted by Herr Felix Weingartner, the eminent Berlin Capellmeister, and proved an enormous success. Beethoven's C minor Symphony, Liszt's symphonic poem "Tasso," and the conductor's symphonic poem "Die Gefilde der Seeligen" (inspired by Böcklin's painting) were included in the programme.

WIESBADEN.—Herr Albert Eibenschütz, of Berlin, has been appointed to the directorship of the Royal Conservatorium, Herr Albert Fuchs (for the last nine years the esteemed director of the Institution) having accepted a leading professorship at the Dresden Conservatorium.

ZURICH.—The performance, at the Stadt-Theater, of a cycle of Wagner's operas, extending from the 6th to the 30th ult., and concluding with "Der Ring des Nibelungen," merits a record, considering the comparative smallness of the town, and reflects much credit upon the enterprising spirit of the management.

OBITUARY.

IN ANTON SEIDL, whose sudden death, from blood-poisoning, took place on March 29, in New York, the cause of the Wagnerian music-drama has lost one of its ablest, most enthusiastic, and most experienced champions. Like many of the leading orchestral conductors of the day —Richter, Nikisch, Mottl, Weingartner, Mahler — the deceased was a native of Austria-Hungary, having been born at Budapest on May 7, 1850, his family being originally German. He was a pupil at the Leipzig Conservatorium in 1870-72, and subsequently, on the recommendation of Dr. Richter, he was employed by Wagner, at Bayreuth, with other young musicians of talent, in preparing the scores and parts for the then approaching first production of the "Nibelungen" Tetralogy, in 1876. Thus young Seidl obtained that intimate acquaintance with that stupendous work and with the master's intentions in regard to it which rendered him one of the most competent of its exponents and fully justified his engagement as conductor of the forthcoming Covent Garden performances of the tetralogy. Seidl gained his first practical experience as Capellmeister at Leipzig and at Bremen, and afterwards became the conductor of the company known as the "Wagner Theatre," with whom Herr Angelo Neumann made the tour of Europe, and by whom, in 1882, the memorable first London performance of "Der Ring des Nibelungen" was given at Her Majesty's Theatre. Three years later Seidl succeeded the late Dr. Damrosch as conductor of the German opera and of the Philharmonic concerts in New York, where it is admitted on all hands he rendered yeoman service to the cultivation of musical art generally, and to the popularisation of Wagnerian opera in particular. He directed some of the Bayreuth performances in 1886, and his skilful and eminently musicianlike conductorship of the Wagnerian performances last year at Covent Garden is still fresh in the memory of opera-goers in the metropolis. But he retained his permanent engagements in New York till the last, having but recently declined the offer of a Capellmeistership at the Berlin Opera. On both sides of the Atlantic his loss is being most deeply and sincerely deplored.

We regret to record the death, at the age of seventy, of the REV. DR. WILLIAM STAINER, Sir John Stainer's only brother, which occurred at Highgate on the 9th ult. With much self-denial the deceased clergyman devoted his life to the amelioration of the deaf and dumb. He was acting chaplain of St. Saviour's Church, Oxford Street, where he ministered to those deprived of speech and hearing. He established in a number of Board Schools classes for the afflicted in whom he was so deeply interested, and also set up Homes for them in some ten centres. It is not surprising to learn that he was a man of a singularly kind and sympathetic nature.

Death has removed one of the oldest and most respected townsmen of Bedford in the person of ROBERT ROSE, at the age of eighty-four, which sad event, we much regret to record, took place on March 21. A native of Newport Pagnell, Mr. Rose settled at Bedford at an early age, where he started what has become a very flourishing music and musical instrument business, in which he was actively engaged within a fortnight of his death. Conjointly with his business, Mr. Rose, who was entirely self-taught, followed the profession of music in the town associated with the name of John Bunyan. He formed classes for the teaching of the Hullah system of class-singing, not only in Bedford, but in a great number of villages round about. Mr. Rose was for fifty years organist of St. Peter's, Bedford, a church of some historical interest, a former organist, in 1727, being William Weale, the composer of the beautiful old Psalm-tune "Bedford," which he wrote in triple time, be it observed. The organ, when Mr. Rose began his duties, was a small one-manual instrument, situated in the West gallery. Concurrently with his organistship at St. Peter's, Mr. Rose held a similar post at the Wesleyan Chapel, in those "good old times" when a band was in vogue in addition to the organ, and the hearty singing of that large Wesleyan congregation was something to remember. In later years Mr. Rose was organist at St. Paul's Church, to which he devoted all his attention till increasing deafness compelled him to resign. But even then he was often to be seen singing in the choir of the church. Not only was Mr. Rose an excellent musician, but he was a splendid man of business, exceedingly methodical in his habits, very observant, interested in all he saw, buoyant in spirit, and with a clear intellect up to the last. In spite of his advanced age his geniality, activity, and youthfulness never forsook him. He leaves behind him a very precious memory. His youngest son is Mr. Henry R. Rose, who succeeded Henry Smart as organist of St. Pancras Church, and who is also a professor of the organ at the Royal Academy of Music.

With regret we record the death of JOHN BRADBURY TURNER, which took place on the 14th ult. Mr. Turner, who was born at Stockport, on September 16, 1832, was taught the violoncello by Lieutenant-Colonel S. W. Wilkinson, a well known local amateur. In 1852 he entered the Royal Academy of Music as a resident student, under Sterndale Bennett, of whom he was a favourite pupil, G. A. Macfarren, Dr. Steggall, and others, and he subsequently became a Fellow of the Institution. The deceased musician was formerly music-master at Harrow School. He graduated Mus. Bac. at Cambridge in 1865, his exercise on that occasion being a setting of Psalm 13 for soli, chorus, and orchestra. His other compositions include a cantata, "Thy Kingdom come"; an overture, and a symphony. In addition was also published a Pianoforte Trio in C minor, an admirable and effective work, which has been heard from time to time at chamber concerts. But Mr. Turner's name is best known in association with Trinity College, London, with which he had been connected for a quarter of a century. He was one of the foundation professors of that Institution, and for many years he rendered valuable and faithful service as director of studies.

The death, we regret to say, is announced from New York of STACEY GARDNER POTTS, which took place in that city on the 11th ult. Mr. Potts, who came from an old New Jersey family, was born at Trenton in 1858. He was educated for the bar, but ultimately devoted himself entirely to literary and musical pursuits. From 1881 onwards he was successively organist at various churches. Mr. Potts was one of the editors of The Churchman, with which he had been connected since 1893. He was also, for a time, the American correspondent of THE MUSICAL TIMES.

An excellent musician and teacher of his art, JEAN LOUIS ARISTIDE HIGNARD died on March 27, at Vernon, at the age of seventy-six. A former laureate of the Conservatoire, he made himself known during the earlier part of his career as a composer of light opera, the most successful amongst a number of pieces of this order being "L'Auberge des Ardennes," to which Jules Verne, subsequently rendered famous by his romances, had furnished the libretto, and which was brought out at the Théâtre Lyrique, Paris, in 1860. M. Hignard was highly esteemed by his numerous pupils, amongst them M. Emmanuel Chabrier, and others who have obtained distinction in musical art.

The death is announced, on the 10th ult., at Smyrna, of the Armenian composer DICRAN TCHOHADJIAN, called by his numerous admirers the "Verdi of the Orient." He was a native of Constantinople, and made his studies at Russian and French conservatoires. On his return to Turkey he brought out his first opera on an Oriental subject, entitled "Lebledidji Horhar," which had an immense vogue at Constantinople, Smyrna, Athens, in Roumania, and in Egypt.

Signor JOSEPH LI CALSI died on the 16th ult. He was one of the conductors at Her Majesty's Theatre some twenty years ago and has been a professor at the Guildhall School of Music since its foundation. The deceased artist was in his seventy-third year.

The death is announced, on the 18th ult., at Leipzig, of Dr. Oscar Paul, professor in the philosophical faculty of the Leipzig University and a teacher at the Conservatorium, at the age of sixty-two. Dr. Paul, who was one of the best known personalities in Leipzig, has written a number of valuable articles on musical subjects. He was the musical editor of the Leipziger Tageblatt and one of the founders of the Musikalisches Wochenblatt.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY AND COLONIAL NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

Chelmsford.—Spohr's "Last Judgment" and Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" were very creditably performed by the Chelmsford Musical Society, at its concert, in the Corn Exchange, on March 29. The band, led by Mr. G. H. Wilby, and chorus, numbering over 100 performers, acquitted themselves admirably under the efficient conductorship of Mr. F. R. Frye. The soloists were Miss Lilian Turnbull, Miss Minnie Cullis, Mr. Iver McKay, and Mr. John Sandbrook.

Crewkerne.—The Parish Church choir, assisted by the Crewkerne Choral Class, numbering together sixty voices, gave Stainer's "Crucifixion," at the Parish Church, on Palm Sunday. Under the skilful direction of Mr. L. A. Brookes, the choirmaster and organist of the church, the work was rendered with commendable excellence. The soloists were Mr. E. H. Harp (tenor) and Mr. W. C. Howe (bass), and Mr. Percy Blake presided at the organ.

Crickhowell.—The Crickhowell Choral Society gave Parts I. and II. of Haydn's "Creation" and a miscellaneous selection in the Clarence Hall, on the 13th ult. Mr. G. R. Sinclair (of Hereford) was the conductor, and the soloists were Miss Rosina Hammacott (soprano), Mr. Gwilym Richards (tenor), and Mr. A. Lord (bass). Mr. Donald Heins played the solo part in Saint-Saëns's Rondo Capriccioso for violin and orchestra, and Miss Hammacott sang the Jewel Song from Gounod's "Faust," with orchestral accompaniment.

Croydon.—Miss Agnes I. Fennings, pupil of Mr. R. I. Rowe at the Croydon Conservatoire, gave a pianoforte recital at the Small Public Hall on March 25. The programme included Sonata Appassionata (Beethoven), two pieces by Grieg, one by Weber, three by Schumann, and two by Liszt. Miss Fennings proved herself a pianist of very considerable attainments and made promise of future advancement. The vocalist was Miss Eleanor G. Gibbs.—In connection also with the Croydon Conservatoire of Music a students' concert was given on the afternoon of the 1st ult., at the Small Public Hall. The young performers displayed a high average of merit, and ten members of the teaching staff were represented by their pupils.

Devizes.—The second concert of the season given by the Devizes Musical Association took place on the 13th ult., when "The Messiah" was performed. The chorus entered into this work remarkably well, and the concert was one of the most successful that the Society has given. The soloists were Miss Stanley Lucas, Miss Lucie Johnstone, Mr. G. Perrins, and Mr. Douglas Hoare. Mr. J. Duys led the orchestra, and Mr. H. H. Baker conducted with commendable alertness and precision.

Earlestown.—The Philharmonic Society gave an excellent performance of Sir John Stainer's "Crucifixion" in the Parish Church, on the Tuesday evening in Holy Week. The soloists were Mr. Sprigings (Liverpool), tenor; Mr. Arthur Weber (Liverpool Cathedral), bass; and Mr. P. Couless. The whole work was given in a most careful manner, under the conductorship of Mr. Henry W. Radford, organist and choirmaster of the Parish Church.

Epping.—On the evening of Good Friday Stainer's "Crucifixion" drew a large congregation to the Parish Church. Mr. Donald Penrose conducted and Mr. Henry Riding was the organist.

Felixstowe.—The Choral Society of this attractive watering-place gave a commendable performance of "St. Paul" during the past month, at the Victoria Hall, which reflected the highest credit upon Mr. Thomas Palmer, the conductor, and all concerned in the presentation of Mendelssohn's fine oratorio. The soloists were Miss Amy Sargent, Miss Kate Taylor, Mr. Samuel Masters, and Mr. Arthur Walenn, all of whom acquitted themselves admirably. Mr. F. W. Smithies led the band, and Miss Nellie Palmer deserves a word of praise for the manner in which she played the violoncello obbligato to "Be thou faithful unto death."

Frome.—The choir of Wesley Chapel, assisted by singers from other Nonconformist churches, gave a performance of Rossini's "Stabat Mater" and the latter part of "The Messiah," in the chapel, on the evening of Good Friday, the 8th ult. The chorus numbered seventy voices, and the fine four-manual organ was augmented by a band of twenty-eight performers. The various solos were sung by Miss M. Richards (of London), Miss Bessie Grant, Mr. E. T. Morgan (of Bristol), and Mr. W. Dodds (of Windsor), who acquitted themselves with great satisfaction. Mr. W. E. Cambridge ably presided at the organ, and the indefatigable conductor, Mr. T. Grant (organist of Wesley Chapel), is much to be congratulated.

Gloucester.—The final concert this season of the Gloucester Choral Society took place at the Shire Hall, on the 19th ult. Madame Ella Russell made her first appearance here and both her songs were enthusiastically encored. Messrs. John Francis Barnett, Alfred Gibson, and Pezze gave a refined and finished performance of Mendelssohn's Trio in C minor, besides playing solos. Miss Olive Kennett and Mr. Charles Fry, in two amusing duologues, were honoured with double recalls, and Mr. Ernest Meads was also successful in two recitations. The choir sang two part-songs, under the direction of Mr. Higgs and Mr. A. H. Brewer, the latter also presiding at the organ.

Great Malvern.—The Malvern Choral Society gave a performance of Mendelssohn's "Elijah" on March 30, in the Assembly Rooms, under the direction of Mr. W. Higley. The principal soloists were Miss Carrie Siviter, Miss Alice Lakin, Mr. Herbert Emlyn, and Mr. W. J. L. Higley. The performance of the band—led by Mr. F. Ward—was excellent, and the chorus gave evidence of careful training. Mr. T. J. Bovington and Mr. Burston presided at the organ.

Guernsey.—Handel's noble oratorio "Israel in Egypt" was performed in St. Julian's Hall, by the Guille-Allès Choral and Orchestral Association, numbering upwards of 200 performers, on two evenings running—viz., March 22 and 23. The soloists were Madame Mallia, Miss Edith Hands, and Mr. Ager Grover, the duet "The Lord is a Man of war" being sung by all the tenors and basses of the chorus. The large body of singers gave evident proof of the careful training they had received at the hands of their excellent conductor, Mr. John David, who may be congratulated upon a most successful result of his labours. Mrs. John Gardner rendered valuable assistance as accompanist at the rehearsals.

Henley-on-Thames.—Sir John Stainer's "Crucifixion" was given in Holy Trinity Church, on Thursday evening in Passion Week, by the choir, assisted by members of St. Mary's choir. Messrs. J. W. Dempster and W. Dodds (of Eton College Chapel) ably sang the solos, and Mr. J. H. Chalmers, organist and choirmaster, presided at the organ.

Hull.—The choral and orchestral societies of the Hull Young People's Christian and Literary Institute gave a successful concert, at the Assembly Rooms, on March 31, when the chief feature was Stainer's "Daughter of Jairus." The soloists were Miss Kathleen Mayes, Mr. C. H. Briggs, and Mr. G. W. Haller. Mr. J. A. Wakelin was the accompanist, and Mr. Thomas G. Bufley efficiently conducted the full band and chorus of 100 performers.

Knottingley.—The Knottingley Choral and Orchestral Society gave a concert, in the Town Hall, on March 30. The principal work selected being Macfarren's "May Day." Miss Alice Simons (late Parepa-Rosa Scholar at the Royal Academy of Music) acquitted herself admirably as the soloist in Macfarren's popular cantata and also in songs in the second part of the programme. The glees performed were Mendelssohn's "Farewell to the forest," Iliffe's "Come, fairies, trip it," and "The Shepherd's Chorus" from Schubert's "Rosamunde," the last-named for female voices only and with orchestral accompaniment. Mr. Mark Hill ably conducted a successful concert.

Leicester.—The Leicester Amateur Vocal Society gave its twenty-second annual visitors' evening, in the Temperance Hall, on March 29, when the chief feature of the programme was "The Jackdaw of Rheims," set to music for chorus and orchestra by William H. Speer. Other selections in an interesting scheme included Sullivan's dramatic cantata "On Shore and Sea" and Dr. G. J. Bennett's four-part song "Mary Morison." Mr. H. B. Ellis conducted, and Mrs. Ll. H. Parsons was the accompanist.

Newport, Fife.—The Newport Choral Society gave a concert in the Blyth Hall, on the 6th ult., when Mr. J. More Smieton's excellent cantata "Ariadne" was performed for the fiftieth time, with the composer as conductor. The work was produced in April, 1884, also under Mr. Smieton's baton; and so popular has it since become that its jubilee performance, under similar circumstances, is a very exceptional event. The soloists were Miss Joan P. Keddie (soprano), Mrs. Ireland (contralto), Mr. A. Kelt (tenor), and Mr. R. Chalmers (bass); while the orchestral accompaniments were efficiently rendered by an orchestra under the leadership of Mr. A. M. Stoole. At the conclusion of the cantata Mr. Smieton was congratulated upon the success which has attended the work since its first performance, fourteen years ago.

Newtown (North Wales).—Stainer's "Crucifixion" was given in the Parish Church on Palm Sunday, the 3rd ult., under the direction of the curate, the Rev. G. Roberts. The accompaniments were ably rendered on the organ by Mr. J. Macrone. The work was repeated on the 7th ult.

Preston.—The principal event of the musical season has been the performance, by the Preston Choral Society, of "Israel in Egypt," which took place on March 31. The Society was augmented by Mr. Whittaker's choir from Blackpool on this occasion, and a very fine representation was given of the massive double choruses, "The Hailstone" chorus especially being very effectively sung. With orchestral assistance by members of the Hallé band, there was a very adequate presentation of Handel's great descriptive work. The soloists were Mr. Wilde, Madame Sadler-Fogg, Mr. A. S. Kinnell, Mr. W. H. Cradock, Madame Alice Bertenshaw, and Miss Clara Broadbent. Signor Risegari conducted a most successful performance.

Ramsey (Hunts.).—The Parish Church choir and friends gave a very successful rendering of Mozart's Twelfth Mass on Good Friday. The soloists were Mrs. A. Newton, Mrs. J. Caton, Mr. Ernest Whellams, and Mr. Lawrence, all of whom sang with much acceptance. Mr. J. Legge presided at the organ and Mr. R. E. Newton conducted.

Reading.—On the 14th ult. the local Philharmonic Society gave a performance of "Elijah," in the large Town Hall. The principal vocalists were Madame Emily Squire, Miss Jessie King, Mr. Harry Stubbs, and Mr. Daniel Price, ably assisted in the double quartet by four members of the Society, Miss Ethel Ravenscroft, Miss L. Brooksby, Rev. W. Neville, and Mr. A. W. Knill; and in "Lift thine eyes," Miss Edith King took the second soprano part. The orchestra (augmented from London) and the chorus numbered over 200, and Mr. Strickland conducted a successful performance.

St. Albans.—A performance of Mendelssohn's "St. Paul" was given at the Town Hall, on March 24, by the St. Albans Oratorio Society. The precision and attack of the chorus throughout the work, no less than their refined singing, reflected great credit upon the conductor of the Society, Mr. W. H. Speer. The soloists were Miss Charlotte Dickens, Mrs. E. Gentle, Mr. H. Stubbs, and Mr. Charles Tree. Mr. Stanley Blagrove led the orchestra and Mr. George Rose presided at the organ.

Tunbridge Wells.—The Orchestral Society of this attractive resort, numbering fifty-two performers, gave its first concert of the season at the Great Hall, on March 31. The programme was a comprehensive one, and included Bach's Suite in D, Mackenzie's "Benedictus," Schubert's B minor Symphony, and Beethoven's "Prometheus" Overture. Mrs. Adeney played the solo part in Mendelssohn's Capriccio for pianoforte and orchestra in B minor (Op. 22); Miss Ferguson was the soloist in Beethoven's Pianoforte Concerto in E flat, and Miss Helen Jaxon contributed some songs with acceptance. Mr. Frederick Hunnibell conducted a very successful and interesting concert, at which Sir Walter Parratt and Dr. Lloyd were present.

Walsall.—The Walsall Institute Philharmonic Union gave a performance of "Samson," at the Temperance Hall, on March 28. The soloists were Miss Maggie Jaques, Miss Alice Laking, Mr. Charles Saunders, and Mr. Robert Carter, the last-named being well known locally. The band and chorus of about 150 performers gave an excellent rendering of Handel's fine work. Dr. Swinnerton Heap conducted with his customary ability and Mr. J. Rees was the principal first violin.

Organ Appointments.—Mr. G. Ernest Arundel, Organist and Choirmaster to Devonshire Square Church, Stoke Newington.—Mr. F. Docksey, to Bromsgrove Parish Church, Worcester.—Mr. H. F. Stephenson, Organist and Choirmaster to Christ Church, Mitcham.—Dr. John Greig, Organist and Choirmaster to the Scottish National Church, Crown Court, Russell Street, Covent Garden.—Mr. Charles T. Turner, Organist and Choirmaster to the Horbury Congregational Church, Notting Hill.—Mr. H. E. Wall, Organist and Choirmaster to Parish Church, East Farleigh, Maidstone.

Choir Appointment.—Mr. J. S. Buxton (tenor), to Llandaff Cathedral.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

J. K.—The "Dresden Amen" (the music of which can be obtained, price one penny, from Messrs. Novello and Company Limited) is used by Mendelssohn in the last movement of his "Reformation" Symphony (composed in 1829-30 for the Tercentenary Festival of the Augsburg Protestant Confession); and also by Wagner—who commenced his career as choirmaster at Dresden—in his music-drama "Parsifal." According to Johann Gottlieb Naumann, this "Amen" originally belonged to the Catholic Court Chapel, but found its way first into the Protestant churches of Dresden, and afterwards into many Evangelical-Lutheran country churches of Saxony. It subsequently, however, disappeared from most of the Protestant churches into which it had been introduced.

J. W.—For "melodious cantatas of the degree of difficulty of Stainer's 'Crucifixion,' suitable for performance by a church choir of forty voices with organ accompaniment," you might look at "Rebekah," by Barnby; "The Rainbow of Peace" and "The Holy Child," by Thomas Adams; "Bethany" and "Gethsemane," by C. L. Williams; "Blessed are they who watch," by Hugh Blair; and "Harvest Cantata," by John E. West.

Alpha.—Schumann wrote the following Fantasias for the pianoforte: Fantasiestücke (eight pieces) (Op. 12), Fantasia in C (Op. 17), and three Fantasiestücke (Op. 111). Schulhoff wrote only one Sonata (in F minor) for pianoforte, which may be obtained of Messrs. Novello and Company Limited. Dr. Peace's arrangement for the organ of the Overture to "Oberon" is published by Messrs. Cocks and Co.

J. P.—Kummer's Trios for three bassoons and J. G. Galliard's Six Solos for bassoons may be obtained of Messrs. Novello and Company Limited, as may also those of Haydn's thirty-seven "Divertimenti" that are in print. We do not know of any early English bassoon music. Perhaps some of our readers could supply the information.

Jamaica.—As you are so far beyond the reach of teachers who could give you personal tuition in harmony, we should advise you to take some lessons by correspondence from a qualified teacher, perhaps in England. You will find Stainer's primer on "Harmony" an excellent book wherewith to begin your studies.

L. R. A. M.—The only analysis of Bach's "Chromatic Fantasia" of which we know is that contained in one of the programme-books of the "Popular Concerts." Perhaps Messrs. Chappell and Co., 50, New Bond Street, could supply you with one in which this analysis occurs.

Anxious Enquirer.—Consult "Organs and Organists in Parish Churches. A handbook relating to the custody, control, and use of Organs," by W. C. A. Blew (W. Reeves), price half-a-crown.

C. D.—The English rights of Fohr's "Electro-chemischer Notenschreibapparat" were acquired by Messrs. J. Wallis and Co., 133, Euston Road, to whom application should be made.

J. B.—Yes, Spain has a National Anthem, you will find it, arranged for pianoforte, in a book of National Anthems, authorised by the War Department, and published by Messrs. Boosey and Co.

G. K.—The study of the horn would not seriously affect the voice. You could obtain a first class instrument, with five crooks, for eleven guineas.

Pianist.—A short analysis of Beethoven's Andante in F will be found in Ridley Prentice's "The Musician," Grade V., p. 23 (J. Curwen and Sons).

A. Y. Z.—Pronounce the word "live," in "live-long," as a short vowel.

PREFACE.

The words of these Four-and-Twenty little Songs have been selected from Mr. Norman Gale's delightful volume of Children's Poems. A few modifications of the original text have been made in order to facilitate their musical rendering.

Though in the first instance, no doubt, the songs will be mainly sung to children rather than by them, the Composer's aim has been to observe such conditions in his settings as to make it easy for children to join in singing them themselves. With this object he has endeavoured to furnish simple, rhythmical melodies of a suitable compass, and it will be found that in the case of sixteen out of the twenty-four songs the vocal range is confined to the octave, whilst in only three instances does it exceed nine notes.

Price Two Shillings and Sixpence each.

PRODUCED BY THE ROYAL CHORAL SOCIETY AT THE ROYAL ALBERT HALL, MARCH 16, 1898.

A NEW EDITION OF

THE RUINS OF ATHENS

A CANTATA

THE MUSIC COMPOSED BY

L. VAN BEETHOVEN

THE ENGLISH WORDS WRITTEN AND ADAPTED BY

PAUL ENGLAND.

Price One Shilling and Sixpence.

Full Score and Orchestral Parts, for use with this Edition, may be had on hire from the Publishers.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

It has been changed into a cantata, with English words, written or adapted by Mr. Paul England, the object being to place Beethoven's music in the hands of our choral societies. . . . The result shows a purpose completely achieved, and Messrs. Novello may depend upon a good reward for their enterprise. Such is the beauty of the music—Greek-like in its simple outline—that the cantata will spread rapidly over the country, the more because so much of it is already well-known.

DAILY NEWS.

The chorus of Dervishes, sung by about 500 of the tenors and basses of the Royal Choir, was encored by acclamation; and if Sir Frederick had cared to accept it a similar fate might have befallen the Turkish March and the delicious Interlude. Even still better was the performance of the final chorus, with its curious reminiscences of Mozart and of the prison chorus in "Fidelio." Altogether the revival was a notable one.

DAILY CHRONICLE.

It was a treat to hear music at once so solid and so graceful. "The Ruins of Athens" is not to be ranked among Beethoven's highest achievements, though none but he could have made such effective use of the barbaric element in the chorus of Dervishes—a taking air, emphasised by the wildest accompaniment. . . . The quaint Turkish March and the chorus, with which the work reaches a majestic termination, were also warmly applauded, but nothing—not even the elegant march and chorus, "Twine ye the garlands"—told so well as the impulsive number for the Dervishes, which was rendered with appropriate vigour and energy. . . . As the work is now made suitable for the concert platform, it should be adopted by all choral societies anxious to include in their répertoires compositions of the highest class.

WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.

Considering the rubbishy character of the productions which so frequently secure the attention of local choirs, it is indeed astonishing that such a beautiful work as this of Beethoven should have been neglected so assiduously—though doubtless the absence hitherto of any decent arrangement of the work for this purpose has had something to do with the matter. With the preparation of such an arrangement as that used last night, however, this difficulty has been overcome, and it may be assumed that henceforward the work, which contains some of Beethoven's most graceful and spontaneous choral writing, will be heard more often.

ATHENÆUM.

It is needless to state that the music of "Die Ruinen von Athen" does not display Beethoven in a lofty mood, the master keeping in his lightest manner from the first bar to the last. Consequently there was no serious strain on the executants on Wednesday, and the choral numbers were rendered with power and spirit, the favourite Dervishes' chorus being, of course, encored.

THE

DRAMATIC CANTATA

FOR

Soprano, Tenor, and Bass Soli, Chorus, and Orchestra

THE VERSE WRITTEN BY

SHAPCOTT WENSLEY

THE MUSIC COMPOSED BY

FRANCO LEONI.

PRICE TWO SHILLINGS.
String Parts (in the Press). Wind Parts and Full Score, MS.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

The story, which in some form or other has often been set to music, is a variant of that we find in Benedict's "Saint Cecilia," Sullivan's "Martyr of Antioch," &c., but it seems to be one which has interest for the public, and is not without inspiration for composers. Mr. Leoni, at any rate, has set to it strains which won over their first audience to warm demonstrations of sympathy. . . . Choral societies will find "The Gate of Life" most useful.

STANDARD.

It must be gladly conceded at once that the score shows the hand of a musician who can write with taste and freshness in feeling. The heathen choruses and dances in the first of the three brief parts, the hymn of the Christians, in which the French device of singing with closed lips is adopted, and the final scene of the martyrdom, display full knowledge of effect.

DAILY NEWS.

Comparatively simple and unsophisticated music of this sort, sometimes recalling Gounod, sometimes the Italians, but almost always melodious and pretty, would be far better suited to the country choirs, the more especially as it presents few difficulties and employs only three soloists.

MORNING POST.

There are some attractive numbers in Signor Leoni's score. The opening chorus and the dances that follow are bright and piquant. . . . The hymn sung in prison is pleasing, and the organ is effectively introduced at the close.

GLOBE.

The cantata is not very remarkable for originality of ideas or treatment, and seems better fitted for performance by country musical societies than by a leading London choir. . . . Its fluent writing and thorough knowledge of conventional orchestral devices are points which will probably recommend it to some amateurs, and the excellent way in which the choral numbers were sung by the choir proved that the music was thoroughly appreciated by the performers.

ST. JAMES'S GAZETTE.

Its music is light, bright, tuneful, and dramatic, with a certain resemblance to the writing of Mascagni, Puccini, and Leoncavallo.

ATHENÆUM.

The music is mainly in the modern Italian style as regards phrasing and orchestration, and is written in a manner that cannot fail to prove grateful to performers.

DAILY GRAPHIC.

The choir revelled in the music, which they sang with no less skill than enjoyment, and the vast majority of the audience applauded, wherever there was an opportunity to applaud, with the utmost enthusiasm. The reasons for this success are not far to seek. Mr. Leoni's melodies are of unimpeachable suavity, with the added attraction of possessing a strong family likeness to favourite numbers by a variety of popular composers, from Wagner to Mascagni.

THE SONGS

IN

COMPOSED BY

MOZART.

EDITED, WITH MARKS OF EXPRESSION AND PHRASING,

BY

ALBERTO RANDEGGER.

PREFACE.

Mozart's keen appreciation of the subtleties of the words he set to music is often so evident that, without a thorough understanding of their significance, it would be impossible to sing the music—to the spirit of which the words are closely allied—in strict accordance with the composer's intention.

With a view to meeting this difficulty a special English version has been adapted, to express, as nearly as possible, the literal meaning of the original Italian text.

In these translations no attempt has been made at versification, and they do not claim any literary merit, but they may be used in singing the songs, if desired.

In any case they will prove valuable to singers who are not familiar with the Italian language.

The alterations, cadences, &c., added in small type over the original music, are used by many eminent artists. The Editor, however, does not hold himself responsible for them, and leaves their adoption or rejection to the taste and discretion of the singer.

SIX PIECES

FOR

COMPOSED BY

J. STAINER.

CONTENTS.

I. Andante.
II. Prelude. / Fughetta.
III. Adagio.
IV. On a Bass.
V. Impromptu.
VI. Rêverie.

PRICE FOUR SHILLINGS.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

"Six Pieces for the Organ" are from the experienced and scholarly pen of Sir John Stainer. The book opens with a meditative Andante of great beauty—a movement of which one does not readily tire. In succession we have a capital Prelude and Fughetta, an Adagio of varied character and effect; a very interesting and ingenious movement "On a Bass," an Impromptu, and a Rêverie, which brings the set to a worthy end. No organist should be without these excellent pieces, which are likely to become popular.

DAILY CHRONICLE.

In Sir John Stainer's "Six Pieces for the Organ" are exhibited taste, vigour, and the perfect knowledge of the resources of the instrument that only practical experience can bring. The Fughetta following the Prelude is a particularly pleasing example of this able musician's ripened manner.

CHURCH TIMES.

"Six Pieces for the Organ," by John Stainer, are all alike admirable, and will charm every true musician. The first, third, fifth, and sixth are sweetly smooth and tuneful. A sprightly Fughetta of excellent subject forms No. 3. "On a Bass," No. 4, is remarkably varied, and constitutes a fine and telling piece.

BRISTOL TIMES AND MIRROR.

Sir John Stainer has written for the organ six charming pieces—an Andante, a Prelude and Fughetta, an Adagio, a piece founded on a Bass theme, an Impromptu, and a Rêverie, which are brought together in one volume.

THE SCOTSMAN.

Sir John Stainer is the writer of "Six Pieces for the Organ," which for scholarly writing and agreeable manner may be warmly commended.

IN THREE SECTIONS.

SECTION I.—TECHNICAL PRACTICE
(IN SIX BOOKS).

SECTION II.—STUDIES.

Section I. deals exclusively with the important subject of Daily Technical Practice, and contains a sufficient supply of material for the gradual and steady development of fingering, bowing, intonation, the positions, &c. This Section is issued separately, in six Books, arranged in progresaive order, and, incorporated therein (it may be added), will be found all the Scales, Arpeggi, &c., which are needed by Candidates entering for the Associated Board and other Examinations.

Section II. is formed of a series of original and selected Studies, in six Books. In point of difficulty the Books are carefully co-ordinated with the similarly numbered Books of Section I., and are intended to be used concurrently with them.

In close connection with "A Modern School for the Violin" it is furthermore intended by the authors to issue an extensive repertory of Pieces suitable for teaching, the majority of them selected from the works of acknowledged Masters, and all calculated to encourage the Student and to further the development of a good style. Each piece will be separate, with pianoforte accompaniment, and the violin parts will be furnished with complete marks for fingering, bowing, and expression.

MR. CHARLES KNOWLES
(YORKSHIRE BARITONE)
Of the Crystal Palace and principal Provincial Concerts.
"ST. PAUL."—WEDNESBURY CHORAL SOCIETY.—"In the title-rôle Mr. Charles Knowles made from first to last an excellent impression upon his listeners. The sympathetic rendering of the devotional air 'O God, have mercy,' and, in marked contrast, his splendid interpretation of the fiery 'Consume them all,' showed him to be a vocalist of very high merit. We shall hope to hear him again."—Wednesbury Herald, May 7, 1898.
"The success of the evening was centred in Mr. Charles Knowles, who, we believe, has never been heard in Wednesbury before, but who created an excellent impression some time ago at Walsall. He comes from Yorkshire and possesses all the manly actions and the vigorous style which characterise the Northerner, whilst his singing on this occasion was of high order, so much so that he aroused his audience from coldness to the highest enthusiasm. In the spirited parts he gave them with fine attack and in grand style, while in the subdued music he was equally successful, and showed that he was not without the spirit of an artist."—Midland Advertiser, May 7, 1898.
"FALKA."—GRAND THEATRE, LEEDS, Easter Week.—"With a good voice at his command Mr. Charles Knowles gave a fine portrayal of the bold and impetuous Boleslas, and his two chief songs were very effectively rendered."—Yorkshire Post, April 12, 1898.
"CREATION" AT ARMLEY.—"Mr. Knowles is the possessor of a magnificent voice, and what nature has done for him he has supplemented with a careful training, the result being most satisfactory."—Armley News, April 15, 1898.
GRAUN'S "PASSION" MUSIC, LEEDS.—"Mr Charles Knowles was excellent in the bass solos and gave a particularly vigorous reading of the fine air 'As stands a lofty mountain.'"—Yorkshire Post, April 2, 1898.
"Whilst Mr. Charles Knowles gave a vigorous rendering of the fine, bold, and in its way dramatic solo, 'As stands a lofty mountain.'"—Leeds Mercury, April 2, 1898.
"CREATION."—TONG CHORAL SOCIETY.—"Mr. Knowles justified his engagement by a really admirable rendering of the solos allotted to him."—Bradford Observer, March 24, 1898.
"Mr. Charles Knowles sings with a good deal of dramatic power, and employs a capital voice with other evidences of technical accomplishment, and he was certainly not behind the others in the degree of favours won. His recitatives were very well sung indeed, and in the two airs which fall to the part, 'Rolling in foaming billows' and 'Now heaven in fullest glory,' he was accorded the heartiest plaudits."—Clechheaton Guardian, March 25, 1898.
"JUDAS MACCABÆUS"—"The bass solos were given with admirable effect by Mr. Charles Knowles, who possesses a sonorous and well-trained voice. 'Arm, arm, ye brave,' was given with much spirit, and his vocal capacity was well exhibited in the somewhat florid passage 'The Lord worketh wonders.'"—Yorkshire Post, February 7, 1898.
BALLAD CONCERT AT WORCESTER.—"Mr. Charles Knowles has a bass voice of exceptional quality and purity of tone, and he no doubt was the star of the evening. He sang two solos, for both of which he was encored, Mendelssohn's 'I am a roamer' and Emanuel's 'The Desert.' In the latter song he fairly surpassed the highest expectation, and the audience followed with almost breathless interest the theme of the composition. For encores he gave 'The devout lover' and 'Father O'Flynn.'"—Worcestershire Advertiser, November 27, 1897.

ADDRESS: THE SECRETARY,

VIRGIL PIANO SCHOOL,

CLAVIER HALL, 12, PRINCES ST., HANOVER SQ., W.

MY DEAR MR. VIRGIL,

I feel it both a pleasure and a duty to say to you and to the world that, after a careful study of the principles of your wonderful invention, the Practice Clavier, and a thorough use of the instrument in my own practice, I find it, not merely an old time dumb keyboard (good simply for the silence it brings), but it is without doubt the most powerful awakener of the vital forces of the pianist that has ever been discovered.

The use of your instrument proves that it is not the much hearing of musical sounds, but the exact making of playing movements (which also means a right state of muscles and nerves), which makes effective piano playing.

The method of study and practice which your unparalleled and original technic course and the Clavier make possible is deserving of the highest praise.

The exacting demands which the relentless clicks of the Clavier make upon the fingers reach the nerve centres, and thus control movements as playing movements were never before controlled.

I was quite fearful that those unmusical clicks, so unlike the beautiful tones of my piano, would make my touch unmusical also, but results prove the contrary.

I am a thorough believer in and advocate of the Clavier and its theories, and, trusting that my opinion of your invaluable invention will have some weight, I earnestly recommend the Clavier to all pianists without exception, and to students.

Believe me, yours sincerely,
VLADIMIR DE PACHMANN.

TESTIMONIAL FROM DR. PEACE, OF LIVERPOOL:—

"January 24, 1897.

"I have much pleasure in expressing my high opinion of the Organ you have erected in Trinity Presbyterian Church, Birkenhead. As regards its general quality of tone, the instrument possesses those characteristics which are always associated with high-class workmanship, whilst the mechanical part of it is everything that the most exacting could wish.

"So far as my experience with your work goes, I think it is decidedly one of the best instruments you have built, and I think the congregation has every reason to be congratulated on the possession of a really excellent specimen of genuine artistic Organ-building.

Yours very truly,

"A. L. PEACE."

THE MUSICAL TIMES

AND SINGING-CLASS CIRCULAR.

JUNE 1, 1898.

ALEXANDER CAMPBELL MACKENZIE.

HEREDITY is a marked characteristic of the Mackenzie family. Music has permeated four generations. The great-grandfather of the subject of this sketch was a member of the Forfarshire Militia Band. His son, John Mackenzie (1797-1852), was a violinist in Aberdeen and afterwards in Edinburgh. His son, Alexander (1819-1857), the father of Sir Alexander, was quite a distinguished violinist in the Scottish capital. He was a pupil of Sainton, in London, and of Lipinski, at Dresden. Moreover, he was the first Scottish musician to go to Germany to complete his musical education. An excellent soloist, a first-rate musician, and an admirable player of Scotch airs, he was a great favourite in Edinburgh, where he led the orchestra at the Theatre Royal. He also edited the "National Dance Music of Scotland," and his premature death, at the age of thirty-eight, caused genuine regret.

Alexander Campbell Mackenzie, his distinguished son, was born in Edinburgh, August 22, 1847. Young Mackenzie's earliest recollections are associated with histrionic surroundings. He became impregnated, so to speak, with dramatic feeling, the natural consequence of his childhood's environment. Moreover, he was reared in an atmosphere of music. He received his first lessons in music—pianoforte and violin—at a very early age, and went to Hunter's school for his general education. It so happened that young Bartel, a member of Gungl's band, had settled in Edinburgh. Upon his advice young Mackenzie left the parental roof and went to Schwarzburg-Sondershausen, Bartel's native place, in order to study music.

The boy was only ten years old when his father, who was in weak health, took him to Germany. On parting from his son Mr. Mackenzie said: "I shall never see you again," which proved to be only too sadly true, as three days after his return to Edinburgh he died. The first letter his son ever received contained the news of his father's death.

AT SONDERSHAUSEN. AGED 10.

The Scotch laddie, having been duly settled in the little German town, found that there was only one English-speaking person in the place. Mackenzie entered, as a private pupil, the house of the elder Bartel, the Stadtmusiker, or Stadtpfeiffer, of Sondershausen, who was one of the last of those descendants of the Meistersingers. The Stadtmusiker, who had certain "rights," took apprentices in music, and it was no uncommon thing for a youthful clarinettist to be practising in the wash-house, or a trombone player to be similarly occupied in the wood-cellar. Mackenzie took violin lessons from Uhlrich, a pupil and colleague of Ferdinand David's at Leipzig, and received instruction in theory from Stein, a great friend of Liszt's, who also conducted the Ducal orchestra.

In those days Sondershausen was a hot-bed of the "music of the future." It was a much smaller place than Weimar, near which it is situated. "But," says Sir Alexander, "our band was better than that at Weimar, so much so that Liszt used to bring his compositions in manuscript from there and we used to play them. At the Loh concerts on Sundays people attended from all parts of Germany in order to hear this modern music. As a boy I played second fiddle in the Ducal orchestra, and thus drank deeply from the well-springs of 'advanced' music. For instance, we were the second town in Germany to perform 'Lohengrin,' and we played the 'Tristan' prelude before the opera was brought out. 'Tannhäuser,' of course, Berlioz's 'Harold' and 'Fantastique' symphonies, and his 'King Lear' and 'Francs Juges' overtures. I became acquainted with the score of Gounod's 'Faust' before it was known in England. The last piece that I played in that orchestra was Liszt's 'Faust' Symphony, from the proof sheets. That was in 1861; and when I heard it again by Mr. H. J. Wood's orchestra last year in London it all came back to me after the thirty-six years' interval." Those writers who are in the habit of designating Sir Alexander "Academic," will do well to remember the fact that during the most impressionable years of his life he was nurtured in music of the most advanced school and that it formed his daily artistic sustenance.

MASTER ALEX. MACKENZIE. AGED 12.

KING'S SCHOLAR AT THE R.A.M.

In 1862 young Mackenzie, then aged fifteen, returned home. He had become so Germanised that when he arrived at Leith he could hardly speak his native language. Being very anxious to take some lessons from Sainton, his father's old master, he came to London in order to see that genial man and excellent teacher. The opera season was just about to begin and Sainton was very busy. "I took him some of my compositions," says Sir Alexander, "including a Festal March, which had been played in Germany. "Well, my dear boy," he said, "I don't think that I can give you any regular lessons just now. There will soon be a competition for a King's Scholarship at the Royal Academy of Music. Enter for it, and if you get it—and I should say that you stand a very good chance—I'll take you as a pupil there." In the meantime I obtained an engagement as one of the rank and file of the fiddlers in a theatre orchestra. The first person I called upon in London was the late Berthold Tours, with whom I subsequently played at the same desk in the orchestra. When I first arrived in London from Germany my hair was very long, and as I wore a turban hat, my somewhat feminine appearance aroused the curiosity of the boys in the street, who followed me with an attention more obtrusive than pleasant. In sheer desperation I made for the first barber's shop I could find in the Blackfriars Road, and had my hair cut!" The present hirsute covering of Sir Alexander's pericranium is in strong contrast to that of his youthful days. "If," he says, pointing to his early photograph, "I could only finish my career with a head of hair like that, I should die happy."

In December, 1862, Mackenzie duly competed for the King's Scholarship and won it, the successful lady candidate being Miss Agnes Zimmermann. "As I had," he says, "to attend at Tenterden Street from 10 a.m. to 5 p.m. on the day, I had to absent myself from a rehearsal at the theatre, with the result that the conductor discharged me. However, when he heard that I had gained the scholarship I was reinstated. My masters at the Academy were Charles Lucas, for harmony; F. B. Jewson, for pianoforte; and for violin, my principal study, dear old Sainton. I knew nothing of counterpoint before I went to Lucas. When I showed him anything rather startling in my composition exercises, he would remark, punctuating it with a pinch of snuff: "That is all very well for young Scotland (pinch), but it won't do; take it out, sir." At the Academy concert of December 17, 1864, the Musical World records that "a fragment from a manuscript opera, 'Lallah Rookh,' by Mr. A. Mackenzie, was performed." In the following year Mackenzie said "good-bye" to the Academy, but not for ever.

FIDDLING IN LONDON THEATRES.

In order not to overburden his mother, young Mackenzie, who was then only fifteen, continued to fiddle away in various theatre bands. He played at nearly every theatre in London during his studentship, under various conductors. On one occasion—probably his first appearance as a conductor—he had to take the baton on an emergency, when his youthful appearance called forth the remark that he should grow a beard as soon as possible. "I have never had a lesson in orchestration in my life," observes Sir Alexander. "But I picked up an immense deal of practical knowledge and invaluable experience in orchestration during my nightly work in those theatre orchestras."

A TEACHER OF MUSIC IN EDINBURGH.

Upon the completion of his Academy course, Mackenzie's friends thought that he should take his father's place at Edinburgh. He accordingly returned to his native city in 1865, but worked in a different sphere. He became well known as an excellent solo violinist; so much so, that when Mr. Arthur Chappell brought Joachim, Strauss, Lady Hallé, and Piatti, the pillars of his "Popular" quartet, to Scotland, Mackenzie was considered competent to play second violin in the quartet. He also started Classical Chamber Concerts in conjunction with Mr. William Adlington, the well-known concert agent, at which Schumann's Pianoforte Quartet and Quintet were performed for the first time in Scotland. He became conductor of the Scottish Vocal Music Association in November, 1873, when many choral works, such as Schumann's "Paradise and the Peri" and "Faust," were introduced to the Scottish capital.

He was in great request as a pianoforte teacher. He taught at the Edinburgh Ladies' College for six hours every day except Saturday. Eight pupils played the same piece, or the same scales, simultaneously upon eight different pianofortes! Thus forty-eight lessons were given in the six hours per diem. "The plan used to work admirably," Sir Alexander says, "and the rhythmical faculty was well developed in those girls. But there was a frightful wear and tear to the nerves in watching sixteen hands simultaneously, and I found it a tremendous strain, especially as I was teaching altogether for no less than ten or eleven hours each day." He also taught at the Training College for the Church of Scotland. The late John Hullah, the Government inspector, repeatedly referred to him in the most complimentary terms in his official reports to the Education Department. "Mackenzie," said Hullah, "combines in himself the rarest of opposing qualities. He is not only an earnest, excellent, and conscientious musician, but he is also endowed with thorough business capacities."

SIR ALEXANDER A SCOTCH PRECENTOR.

On October 1, 1870, the present Principal of the Royal Academy of Music was appointed Precentor and Leader of the choir of St. George's Parish Church, Charlotte Square, Edinburgh. "The church had been preached empty," he says, "and we filled it with music. I had a choir of thirty voices, all paid, and I retained this appointment for ten years." The choir held the foremost place in the Scottish capital, and when Sir Alexander resigned the leadership, the Kirk Session of St. George's passed the following resolution at losing their able conductor:

The Kirk Session record their regret at losing his services as the conductor of the choir of St. George's, and express their sense of the great proficiency to which he had brought the choir, and the very efficient manner in which he had performed his duties as conductor; also the pleasure they had in their communications with him, and sincerely wish him every success in the new sphere of life which he has adopted.

AN IMPORTANT COMPOSITION.

His "new sphere of life" was composition. The ceaseless activity and mental strain of daily teaching prevented Mackenzie from following the bent of his inclination. He had little time for composition. But those Edinburgh years were not altogether barren in creative effort. Besides a Pianoforte Trio and a String Quartet (still in MS.), he had written a Pianoforte Quartet in E flat, which he called Op. 11. This work he published, at his own expense, at a German house. Strangely enough, Hans von Bülow had come across the proof sheets of the quartet at the German publisher's and then and there made enquiries about the composer. "When he heard that I had paid a German publisher £20 for the printing of my pianoforte quartet, he fired up and said: 'Write him a furious letter, and say you will buy the quartet back. I have a few pounds to spare; you shall have them.'" The refusal of this kind offer by no means depreciated the friendly interest of Bülow in his young friend. Bülow and Manns were two of the best friends the young Scottish composer ever had. The Pianoforte Quartet in E flat was performed in London on March 4, 1875, at one of the chamber concerts given by Mr. Willem Coenen. Through the kindness of Mr. Coenen we are enabled to make two extracts in reference thereto from his autograph album. The first records the introduction of Mackenzie, through his quartet, to the musical critic of the Times:

J. W. DAVISON, with many sincere thanks for the treat given me by his concert at St. George's Hall this evening, and especially for Mackenzie's Quartet.

To his friend, W. Coenen, Esq. March 4, 1875.

The second is a letter to Mr. Coenen and speaks for itself:

2, Darnaway Street, Edinburgh,
March 13, 1875.

DEAR SIR,—Had not a heavy week's work prevented me, I should have written to you before this to thank you most heartily for your kindness in bringing my little work before the public. I have not seen any notice of it as yet, but I suppose there may be some mention of the concert in this week's musical papers. I may say that I live here in Schlaraffenland [a fool's paradise], pretty far removed from any musical circles likely to encourage a young Scotch musician, and consequently I have double difficulty in getting a hearing of anything that I may do. I am therefore the more obliged to you for bringing the quartet forward, and I only hope that it did not disappoint you in its effect. The encouragements I have had from yourself, Dannreuther, and M. de Bülow are sufficient to incite me to some further work, and I hope soon to be able to put something better before you.

Meanwhile, although somewhat late, be kind enough to accept warm thanks for your assistance and encouragement. —Believe me, dear Sir, faithfully yours,

W. Coenen, Esq. A. C. MACKENZIE.

HANS VON BÜLOW.

When Hans von Bülow conducted a series of orchestral concerts at Glasgow and Edinburgh, in the winter of 1877-78, he sought out the young Scotch musician whose pianoforte quartet had so greatly impressed him. Bülow accepted for performance an overture, "Cervantes," still in MS., by Mackenzie, and the young composer went to Glasgow to hear it performed. He arrived when Bülow was giving "the horns a dose" at the rehearsal. Bülow asked Mackenzie to conduct it in the evening, but the composer begged to be excused as he had not any dress clothes with him. "Mrs. Stillie," said Bülow to the wife of the distinguished Glasgow critic, "has your husband a second dress suit he will lend my friend?" Mrs. Stillie's affirmative reply only partly relieved the difficulty. At that time Mackenzie, owing to long-continued ill-health, was very slim, while Stillie was of a comfortable rotundity. However, such a fitting (or misfitting) opportunity was not to be thrown away, and Mr. Mackenzie appeared, not as a wind-baggy (pace Carlyle), but as a baggily-clad musician on that occasion. On the following Monday Bülow came to Edinburgh to conduct, when he was Mackenzie's guest. The overture was again performed, but Bülow insisted that the composer should conduct it, while he, wearing a red fez, sat amongst the audience and applauded most vigorously. "He put me forward from the best of motives," says Sir Alexander, "and was very kind." Bülow had some curious methods for exercising his memory. Before entering a train he would walk up and down the platform committing to memory the numbers on all the carriages.

During his teaching period at Edinburgh, Sir Alexander Mackenzie kept in touch with his old master, Sainton, and his orchestral colleagues in London, by playing in the orchestra at the Birmingham Festivals of 1864, 1867, 1870, and 1873. In the humble capacity of a second violin player he assisted at the first performances of the following works: "The Bride of Dunkerron" (Smart), "Naaman" (Costa), "Kenilworth" and "The Light of the World" (Sullivan), "The Woman of Samaria" (Sterndale Bennett), "The Ancient Mariner" and "Paradise and the Peri" (J. F. Barnett), "Nala and Damayanti" (F. Hiller), "St. Peter" (Benedict), "The Lord of Burleigh" (Schira), and "Fridolin" (Randegger)—all, except "The Woman of Samaria," under the direction of their respective composers. "The only time I ever saw Costa laugh," says Sir Alexander, "was when Schira was conducting the rehearsal of his 'Lord of Burleigh.' When we were playing our greatest possible fortissimo, Schira shouted at the top of his voice, 'Fire, fire!'"

FLORENCE.

The wear and tear of the exacting life led by Sir Alexander Mackenzie during those toilsome Edinburgh years, with its ceaseless activity, Sundays and week-days, proved a terrible strain upon his constitution—in fact, he quite broke down in health. Moreover, he longed to exchange the routine work of teaching for the more congenial, if less pecuniarily profitable, occupation of composing. Accordingly, having saved sufficient money, he relinquished his Edinburgh appointments, and, on the advice of Bülow, settled at Florence.

For the first six months after his arrival at Florence the exhausted, hard-worked teacher from Edinburgh did nothing. But one to whom hard work from his childhood had been the very elixir of life was not likely to dwell in idleness from mere choice. When his health had been recuperated he set to work at the congenial task of composition, and wrote his cantata "The Bride," given at the Worcester Festival of 1881. This was followed by "Jason" (Bristol, 1882), "Colomba" (1883), and "The Rose of Sharon" (Norwich, 1884), all of which were composed at Florence.

LISZT.

During his sojourn at Florence Sir Alexander renewed the acquaintance, which he had formed during his boyhood at Sondershausen, with Liszt. The king of pianists and the Scottish composer met frequently at the house of Carl Hildebrand, a rendezvous of artists, poets, and musicians. Owing to an unfortunate misunderstanding on the part of Liszt the friendship between the two men was in danger of being terminated; but when the great-souled artist found that he had made a mistake, he seemed as if he could not do sufficient to show his regret. "Where is that Scotchman?" he said, "I want to know his music." Mackenzie was at once obliged to fetch his Scotch Rhapsodies; and, although supper was waiting, Liszt insisted upon playing one of them, from the four-hand arrangement, with Sophie Menter, before he would sit down to the meal, and the other was played before he retired to rest. The next morning Liszt took the scores away with him to Pesth in order that they should be performed by the Philharmonic Society there. His request to have them performed, for some reason or other, was not complied with; he showed his disapproval of the treatment meted out to his young friend's music by absenting himself from the city for some years. Mackenzie saw a great deal of Liszt while he was living at Florence, and played duets with him on several occasions. In conjunction with Liszt he here became acquainted with the works of Tschaïkowsky, Borodin, and Rimsky-Korsakow, and thus acquired familiarity with the Russian school long before it had become a craze in London. In fact, he introduced Tschaïkowsky's now famous "Pathetic" Symphony to a London audience at the Philharmonic concert of February 28, 1894, and repeated it on March 14, as well as Borodin's Symphony in B minor on February 27, 1896. When, in later years, Liszt was invited to England in 1886 to hear a performance of his "St. Elizabeth," given at the Novello concerts conducted by Sir Alexander, Liszt replied: "Mackenzie! Ich schulde ihm etwas (I owe him something). I will come." The visit of Liszt—after an absence of forty-five years from London—to Westwood House, Sydenham, the residence of the late Henry Littleton, was the great event of the Spring of 1886. This visit, which will always be remembered as having called forth so much spontaneous enthusiasm—even more than the distinguished visitor himself had anticipated—was due to the happily combined influence of Mackenzie, the late Walter Bache (Liszt's devoted pupil), and Messrs. Novello.

It is interesting to record the fact that the commencement of a Fantasia on Mackenzie's opera "Troubadour" was found after the great pianist's death on his writing table. It was his last attempt at composition. In connection with Liszt and his compositions, Sir Alexander relates the following incident. One morning he saw him off to Rome by a train leaving Florence at 5.30 a.m., Liszt, who allowed himself no luxuries, travelling second class. Mackenzie had just heard of a performance in England of Liszt's 13th Psalm. When he told the composer, Liszt immediately replied: "Herr, wie lange" (Lord! how long!)*

J. W. DAVISON.

At the Worcester Festival of 1881, Sir Alexander having temporarily left his Italian retreat, conducted his cantata "The Bride." Here, for the first time, he met J. W. Davison, who was very complimentary to the Scottish composer, telling him that he knew his Pianoforte Quartet, and so on. At that time Davison was contributing to the columns of the Musical World his "Pills for candidates. (Administered by Dr. Beard.)" One of the pills administered by "Dr. Beard" (otherwise "J. W. D.") to his patient Mackenzie was an extract from a pianoforte sonata. Mackenzie, thinking that he could detect the style of the music, replied "That's Dussek." Davison replied: "You're the first man that has guessed that. You're one of us!" Who, besides "Dr. Beard," formed the noble army of Davison's "us" is not recorded. Here is another Davison story. After the Norwich Festival of 1884, at which "The Rose of Sharon" was produced, Sir Alexander made his way to Westgate to visit some friends. He called frequently upon Davison at Margate, where the great critic was living in one of the hotels. Davison used to "come down" about two o'clock in the afternoon and sit over some oysters in the bar till about the hour of five. Upon the entry of a jug-laden lady customer asking for her counter-pint of thorough Bass, Davison, pointing to Mackenzie, said: "Susan, don't you know who this is? This is the composer of the 'Rose of Sharon.' Nothing like it since 'Elijah'!" When the name of Wagner was mentioned, "J. W. D." would exclaim: "Police! Police!"

LONDON AND THE NOVELLO CONCERTS.

In 1885 Messrs. Novello revived the oratorio concerts that had been given from 1869-1875. They offered the conductorship of the concerts to "Mr." A. C. Mackenzie and he accepted it. The duties attending the post were very responsible and onerous. Several new and, moreover, difficult works were performed during the two seasons. Amongst these may be mentioned "St. Elizabeth" (Liszt), "Stabat Mater," "Spectre's Bride," and "St. Ludmila" (Dvorák), "The Golden Legend" (Sullivan), "Morset Vita" (Gounod), "The Rose of Sharon" (Mackenzie), &c. Meanwhile, having settled at Sydenham, he continued to compose. Previous to this he had brought with him from Florence a "Ballad for Orchestra" founded on Keats's "La Belle Dame sans Merci," first performed at the Philharmonic concert of May 9, 1883. The period 1886-7 witnessed the composition of the "Story of Sayid" (Leeds Festival, 1886), "Troubadour" (Drury Lane, 1886), "Jubilee Ode" (Crystal Palace, 1887).

THE PRINCIPALSHIP.

During the year 1887 Sir Alexander resided at Maidenhead, coming up to town for his concert engagements. But the longing to get back to Florence proved too strong for him and he returned to Italy in the latter part of the year. Almost immediately after he had set his foot on Italian soil, the death of Sir George Macfarren caused the Principalship of the Royal Academy of Music to become vacant. Sir Alexander Mackenzie was appointed to that important office February 22, 1888. His wise administration of our oldest music school—with the assistance of valued colleagues whose help he always gratefully acknowledges—is too well known to need comment or commendation.

Sir Alexander composed one of his finest works, "The Dream of Jubal," to Mr. Joseph Bennett's admirable poem, for the jubilee of the Liverpool Philharmonic Society, which took place on February 5, 1889. He directed three concerts of the Royal Choral Society for the late Sir Joseph Barnby during that musician's lifetime, and after his death, in 1896, he conducted the Society's concerts for the remainder of the season. In the same year he directed six concerts for the late Sir Charles Hallé at Manchester and elsewhere. In 1892 he was elected conductor of the Philharmonic Society, the first concert under his direction taking place on March 9, 1893.

DISTINCTIONS AND COMPOSITIONS.

Sir Alexander Mackenzie received the honorary degree of Mus.D., St. Andrew's, 1886; Cambridge, 1888; and Edinburgh, 1896. He received the gold medal for art and science from the Grand Duke of Hesse, 1884; the Order,

* Liszt's 13th Psalm was first performed in England at a concert given by the late Walter Bache, at St. James's Hall, February 28, 1873.

Art and Science, Saxe-Coburg and Gotha, 1893. He is a Corresponding Member, Istitúto Reale di Firenze, a Member of the Royal Swedish Academy (1898), and of other foreign societies. In 1895 he received the honour of Knighthood from the Queen.

In a little penny memorandum-book, first used many years ago, Sir Alexander has entered every one of his numbered and unnumbered compositions, the latter amounting to sixty. His Opus 1 is a Romance for pianoforte, published in Edinburgh. One of his earliest songs, "The song of love and death," was published by Novello, "and it is not a bad song either," the composer says. As he had heard nothing of the manuscript for two years, he wrote to his friend Berthold Tours, little knowing that he was musical adviser to Messrs. Novello, asking him: "Who is the man in possession at Novello's?" "I am the man in possession," replied Tours, "and from a pile of things left by my predecessor I have extricated your song." It was very soon afterwards published. Within the limits of our space it is only possible to record, in addition to those already mentioned, the more important compositions by Sir Alexander Mackenzie.

Choral Works.—"The New Covenant" (Glasgow, 1888), "The Cotter's Saturday Night" (Edinburgh, 1892), "Veni, Creator Spiritus" (Birmingham, 1891), "Bethlehem," 1894, "His Majesty" (comic opera, 1897).

Orchestral.—Scherzo (Glasgow, 1878), Scottish Rhapsodies, Nos. 1 and 2. Overtures: "To a Comedy," "Tempo di Ballo," "Twelfth Night," and "Britannia" (on "Rule, Britannia"). Incidental music to "Ravenswood" (Lyceum, 1890), "Marmion" (Edinburgh), and "The Little Minister" (Haymarket Theatre, 1897). "From the North" (three pieces for orchestra).

Concertos.—(Violin), Op. 32 and Pibroch; (pianoforte), "Scottish" (Op 55).

In addition to his larger works, he has written numerous violin, pianoforte, and organ pieces; songs, part-songs, and anthems. His "Benedictus" for violin has attained great popularity. In connection with his Benedictus, Sir Alexander relates the following incident: "Last year, during the Jubilee festivities, a gentleman asked to be introduced to me, and on shaking hands with me he said: 'I want to know you; our band plays your Benedictus twice a week at Hong Kong!'"

THE ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

Sir Alexander speaks in high terms of his staff of professors and of the students at the Academy. Speaking upon the subject of the Academy and of a thorough preparation for the musical profession, Sir Alexander says: "The curriculum is not only very thorough, but the range of music studied within those walls embraces all schools, ancient and modern. I have a very thorough belief in the value of systematic teaching under competent professors. The benefits attending the study of music in an Academy are akin to the education acquired at a large University, where a young fellow learns his classics and sits at the feet of those who are his superiors in knowledge. A wild, hot-headed youth, permeated with the fantastic side of music, needs to be moulded into something like order; this we endeavour to do, and when he has, so to speak, subjugated himself to those principles of law and order which have guided the great masters of music, then he is fit to develop whatever originality he may possess."

It should be recorded that the initiation of the Examinations of the "Associated Board" is due to Sir Alexander. Being dissatisfied with the scheme of the Academy Local Examinations, he, in company with Mr. Thomas Threlfall, Chairman of the Committee of Management of the Academy, called upon Sir George Grove, in order to enlist the co-operation of the Royal College of Music in promulgating a more satisfactory system of examinations, the success and development of which have been attended with remarkably gratifying results.

"What new works have you now in hand?" we asked Sir Alexander before leaving his pleasant study, situated at the top of his house near the Zoo. "Well, I should like to do something in my lighter vein. And why not? Besides a one-act serious opera by my friend Fred. Corder, I have still a comic opera by B. C. Stephenson in my desk. My first popular success was a comic part-song for male voices, 'A Franklyn's dogge leped over a style.' However, I have just finished three orchestral pieces—Prelude 'Astarte,' Pastorale, and 'Flight of the Spirits,' for a stage performance of 'Manfred.' No one would dare to write an overture after Schumann's. And then what do you think of these words which I have just begun to set?" he asks, as he hands us a dainty book of verse by a living poet. "A capital idea," we reply, on glancing at the racy couplets. "In what form do you propose to cast it?" "A choral ballad," is the response—"different sections of the choir answering one another in telling the story. Yes, I think it will do," he adds with a cheery smile as we say "good-bye" at the conclusion of a pleasant chat with the composer of "The Rose of Sharon."

SOME PRESENT ASPECTS OF MUSIC.

IV.

IN his noble Ode, William Collins describes the Passions as drawn to "Music, heavenly maid," by the sound of her shell. They—

> Thronged around her magic cell,
> Exulting, trembling, raging, fainting,
> Possest beyond the muse's painting:
> By turns they felt the glowing mind
> Disturbed, delighted, raised, refined;—

till, "filled with fury," they snatched the instruments, and—

> Each (for madness ruled the hour)
> Would prove his own expressive power.

We all know how Fear, Anger, Despair, Revenge, and generally the more violent of the crew acquitted themselves; and with what tender appreciation the poet dwells upon the expression of Hope, Melancholy, Cheerfulness, and Joy. Moreover, we all remember the closing invocation:

O Music, sphere-descended maid,
Friend of pleasure, wisdom's aid!
Why, goddess, why, to us denied,
Lay'st thou thy ancient lyre aside?

. . . . . .

Where is thy simple, native heart,
Devote to virtue, fancy, art?
Arise, as in that elder time,
Warm, energetic, chaste, sublime.

Let it be noted that our poet draws a distinction between Music and the action of the Passions. It was not she that engendered fury, kindled love, but the Passions, playing upon her instruments. May we then conclude that in its essence, its primary state, music is apart from human feeling, though capable of giving utterance to it; in other words, that while music can be made the "language of emotion" it is not emotional of necessity?

In the invocation just cited, Collins clearly longs for a revival of primary conditions. "Return in all thy simple state," he exclaims. So William Blake, in another invocation:

How have you left the antient love
That bards of old enjoyed in you!
The languid strings do scarcely move,
The sound is forced, the notes are few.

It is curious to observe how far the poets generally refer to music as operating in spheres distinct from that of passion. There is, for example, the sphere of imagination, and Pope indicates it:

I seem through consecrated walks to rove,
I hear soft music die along the grove:
Led by the sound, I roam from shade to shade,
By god-like poets venerable made.

Dryden makes the world's grey fathers see a god in Jubal's shell; Keats asked for music dying; as a supreme delight, Milton "took in strains that might create a soul under the ribs of death"; and, in a well-known passage, the prose-poet, Carlyle, speaks of music as laying open "the infinite" to our gaze. Here obviously is no question of passion, but of the working of an attribute higher than an elementary and common endowment. Even when the poets do connect music and emotion, it is generally with reference to gentle effects and calming influences. Hear Shakespeare:—

In sweet music is such art,
Killing care, and grief of heart
Fall asleep, or, hearing die.

When griping grief the heart doth wound,
And doleful dumps the mind oppress,
Then music with her silver sound,
With speedy help doth lend redress.

Soft stillness, and the night
Become the touches of sweet harmony.

Referring to a "wild and wanton herd"—

You shall perceive them make a mutual stand,
Their savage eyes turned to a modest gaze
By the sweet power of music.

Nought so stockish, hard, and full of rage,
But music for the time doth change his nature.

Most heavenly music!
It nips me into listening, and thick slumber
Hangs upon mine eyes.

Such quotations might be multiplied a hundredfold from the works of other poets:

Tennyson:

Music which gentlier on the spirit lies
Than tired eyelids upon tired eyes.

Moore:

Oh! 'tis only music's strain
Can sweetly soothe and not betray.

Hogg:

Slight emblem of the bliss above,
It soothes the spirit all to love.

Among the prose-writers who bear like testimony is Luther: "Music is . . . the only art that can calm the agitations of the soul." Hazlitt: "It came upon my heart like the calm beauty of death; fancy caught the sound, and faith mounted on it to the skies. It filled the valley like a mist, and still poured out its endless chant, and still it swells upon the ear, and wraps me in a golden trance, drowning the noisy tumult of the world." I could easily fill these pages with extracts similar in purport.

It is certainly curious and significant that so many of our great writers in verse and prose regard music less as a stimulus to emotion than as a means of calming it; less as an exciting voice than as one which, "with most miraculous organ," speaks of peace. For them the art chiefly appeals to the "divine attribute of the imagination," or else calms the tempests of feeling.

But—here the poets may be dismissed—music has yet another function, which belongs to itself in its abstract forms. This is much less recognised than any other because apparent only to those who have some technical knowledge and perception. It is none the less real on that account. What musician is not conscious of intellectual gratification, and the pleasure that comes of order and proportion, when listening to such a work as Bach's Prelude and Fugue in G minor; or to Beethoven's Variations on a Theme by Diabelli, or to the closing movement of the "Jupiter" Symphony? In these and countless other cases there is no question of emotion. The enjoyment is purely intellectual, and for keenness, as musicians know, it suffers nothing by comparison with the delight which arises from forms less abstract. We have, then, three aspects of music—viz., those which appeal respectively to the emotions, the imagination and the intellect. So much for demonstration, and now for some very practical remarks.

The question is whether, at the present time, a due sense of proportion is shown in our cultivation and patronage of the three grand divisions of music. My own reply is distinctly in the negative. Let us take the case of what I have chosen to describe as intellectual music. Every close observer must admit that this form of the art has actually lost ground. I am old enough to remember a time when it enjoyed no small share of favour—when audiences heard purely abstract music with pleasure, and followed with more or less appreciation a contrapuntal development. Some of us do so now, but we are the survivors of a musical public which has practically passed away and given place to another, trained, when trained at all, under different influences, and having, as it seems to us, a susceptibility in which we do not share. Within my experience of music, nothing is more remarkable than the changes just indicated. It may be in recollection that some of their causes, or what I take to be such, were pointed out in a previous paper, and they need not be discussed now. Enough that, what with public craving for nervous excitement, the inevitable result of our modern life; what with the abuse of the modern orchestra in ministering to that unhealthy appetite, and what with the preponderance among our enlarged audiences of persons imperfectly equipped for judging questions of art, the forms of intellectual music are almost set aside, or minister only to the pleasure of a small minority. Some time ago a dead set was made against the fugue. It would be uncharitable, perhaps, to suppose that many sneered at what they could not comprehend, but it is far more easy to believe that than to accept the idea that the "dead set" was made by persons of musical culture and perception. I know no other case of open and destructive hostility to music of this kind, but indifference, in such a case, is as fatal as virulent opposition, and unless a change comes the intellectual forms of our art will be given over by the living world into what it would call the dead hands of scholars. That prospect is distinctly lamentable.

In the domain of music appealing to the imagination—music, that is to say, which, like Beethoven's C minor Symphony, is emotional and suggestive, but indefinite, our present condition is by no means satisfactory. Not but what it has thousands of admirers, who welcome its masterpieces, and revel in their legitimate and exalting effect. All the same, slowly yet surely, this class of works is being elbowed out of favour by programme music, and by "up to date" compositions brave in the trappings of sensationalism. To my mind we have here the most alarming feature in the present outlook. Intellectual music, for many generations to come, perhaps for ever, will be the pleasure of the few. But works of the class now referred to should be the delight of every amateur who is out of leading-strings. Alas, they are not, and the very citadel of music is in danger, since by them the most precious interests of the art stand or fall. Are we, then, to conclude that imagination as a popular faculty is dead? Not at all. But every movement is made along the line of least resistance, and the activity of imagination ceases when the merely physical effects of music satisfy, as, also, when we are bound down to a "programme." The fear is that imagination, in this particular field of its legitimate activity, will gradually weaken, and that we shall more and more lean upon the programmist, who so kindly saves us trouble, and, at the same time, saps our strength.

My preaching is vain of immediate effect, I know. He who remonstrates with the impulses of his age casts paper against the wind, only to find it blown back in his face. There are some who say, "Ephraim is joined to his idols; let him alone." That may be politic, but it is neither manly nor dutiful. The destiny of all things, humanly speaking, is shaped by victories in the war of opinion, and it is the business of every man who enters into the conflict to fight on, even though he stand alone as a "forlorn hope." This explains why I return again and again to the vital matter of present tendencies in music, and bid all whose ears my voice can reach to reflect upon the growing degeneration of taste and neglect of the high principles of art. What other course is open when we find the noisiest and most barbaric movement in a favourite symphony received with the greatest applause; when a mere eccentricity like Saint-Saëns's "Danse Macabre," sandwiched between masterpieces of Mozart and Beethoven, is awarded honours refused to them; when compositions that deal sensationally with repulsive subjects have a better chance of success than any other; when composers are busy with illustrations instead of creations, and when the process of composition itself is degraded to the art of a tessellated pavement? Of course, this is a passing phase. The law of change governs evil as well as good, and the tide ebbs as well as flows. It will do so the sooner in the present case the more those who are alive to the danger are earnest and persistent in warning. Probably not many of us will live to see Music once more clothed and in her right mind, after the present period of madness; but it is a comfort to know that such a result is not beyond the possible or even the probable.

THE STRUCTURE OF INSTRUMENTAL MUSIC.*

By W. H. Hadow, M.A., B.Mus.

III.

THE INFLUENCE OF THE ROMANTIC MOVEMENT.

In the instrumental music of the eighteenth century design prevailed over expression; by Beethoven the two are held in equipoise; with the romantic composers the balance inclines on the emotional side. Hence an apparent paradox. In Beethoven's form the highest organisation of structure goes with the richest emotional content; in the romantic period music becomes more directly expressive, and yet, on the whole, its artistic value declines.

For this there are two main reasons: first, that in some cases the emotion itself is ill-balanced and extravagant; second, that the art of the time is not as a rule pure music, but music saturated with literature. In Germany, as in France, the composers were intimately affected by the poets and essayists; they maintained the same causes, they opposed the same enemies; it is little wonder that they sometimes employed the same weapons. Hence, though in many respects they did true and eminent service to music, they yet stand on a lower plane than Beethoven, some because they mistook violence for strength, some because they were pre-occupied with an alien method.

A distinction should be made between the two great literary movements which gave inspiration respectively to Schumann and Berlioz. In Germany the aim was to create a national literature; to construct a "Temple of Art" which should no longer be "modelled after the be-powdered Olympus of Versailles." In France it was almost entirely a revolt against formation and a direct appeal to the passions and sympathies of the reader. Hence there was a taint of sensationalism in the latter from which the former was preserved by the dignity of its ideal. And it may be added that Berlioz wrote while the stress of the French movement was at its height; Schumann at a time when German letters had established themselves in authority, and when men could take a quieter and more dispassionate view of the struggle.

The beginning of the new school may practically be dated at 1830, the year in which Berlioz won the Prix de Rome; in which Chopin entered Paris; in which Schumann gave up the law and definitely began his career as a musician. The field was almost open. Schubert had been dead two years, Beethoven three, Weber four; apart from the Italian opera composers, there was no one of European repute except Spohr, quietly occupied at Cassel with his violin and his pupils, and Mendelssohn, standing on the threshold of manhood and soon to be accepted by one at least of the romantic writers as an unquestioned leader and guide.

For it was Mendelssohn who first revived through Germany an interest in the great choral works of J. S. Bach; and among all musical influences which affected the romantic movement, that of Bach is perhaps the most noticeable. It shows itself mainly in two composers: Schumann and Chopin. "Only study Bach," wrote the one, "and the most complicated of my works will seem clear"; while of the other we know that before one of his rare public improvisations he would shut himself up with the "Wohltemperirte Clavier" and master Bach's secret before he gave forth his own. To this is due in part the harmonic richness which characterises the music of both, and at the same time a certain weakness of structural design. For Bach, the "ancestor of harmony," as Schumann calls him, would obviously afford but little guidance in the great cyclic forms; and thus it is that the strength of the romantic school lies not so much in sonata or symphony, as in the treatment of smaller lyric or narrative pieces in which structural organisation is less elaborate and less complex. The influence of the Viennese composers was on Schumann comparatively slight and on Chopin almost non-existent. It is to Bach and to Bach alone that they owe the greater part of their musical training.

Nationality has always been an important factor in musical art, but nowhere does it show itself with such prominence as in the composers of the present century. In earlier days it was, to some extent, overlaid by the adoption of a common method; in the romantic period it rose to the surface as the language of music grew more free, and so afforded a wider scope for differentiation. Further, it was ostensibly recognised by the romantic writers themselves. Berlioz, despite his frequent quarrels with Paris, remained throughout intensely French in feeling and sympathy. Schumann stood in the forefront of a movement which should do for German music what his hero, Jean Paul, had done for German letters; Chopin's chief ambition, as he himself said, was to be "the Uhland of his fellow-countrymen." Liszt rises to his highest level when inspired by the ballads and dances of his native land. Nor, indeed, is there much room for controversy on a question the negative answer to which would remove music from the category of the arts.

More direct in its bearing on musical structure is the poetic view of composition which is specially characteristic of this period. With Berlioz it reaches its extreme limit in the definite imposition of a programme; with the more distinctively instrumental composers it acts rather by hint and suggestion, but it is never very far absent. Schumann is keenly alive to its influence. He was conspicuously well read; he was himself an author of no small reputation; on more than one side his music strikes us as the outcome of a mind trained in a school of letters. Chopin, too, though far less ostensibly, seems always to write with a definite emotional impression, and his music stirs us in a manner far more intimate and personal than that of a Bach fugue or a Mozart adagio. One result of this is the extreme prevalence of short lyric or narrative forms, which sometimes make their point by the vivid presentation of a single melodic idea, sometimes set out with the intention of illustrating a certain emotional state, and almost always are more affected by the character of their contents than by principles of pure design.

Thus, in treating the larger forms of symphony and sonata, the composers of this period are never wholly successful. If they forego their special method and follow the models of Vienna they seem to be hampered by the restraints of alien and unfamiliar conditions. They cannot be said to have penetrated to the deeper principles which underlie the structure of Beethoven, and either imitate the accidents of his form or, in modifying them, remove at the same time elements that are essential. If, on the other hand, they enlarge the scale without altering the character of their favourite "poetic" pieces, their work, though it is here more interesting, because more spontaneous, is somewhat lacking both in balance of detail and in coherence of general outline. In some cases—e.g., the Ballades of Chopin—we find a distribution of ideas which is not only new, but convincing; such instances are few and exceptional. Structurally speaking, the interest of the period is focussed on two main points: the first, its remarkable power of dealing with the smaller canvas; the second, its removal (though sometimes at too heavy a cost for its own achievement) of conventional restrictions which the preceding age had accepted. By the former of these it enormously increased the lyric use of the pianoforte, by the latter it repealed some outworn and obsolete enactments, and so prepared the way for the true freedom of a rational code.

As the essential feature of the romantic period was the return to Bach, so that of our own day is the return to Beethoven. No doubt a few composers have carried still farther the methods of revolt, and have "taken up music where Berlioz laid it down." Others, again, are taking their tone from Wagner, and applying to the concert-room principles which for their true expression require the stage. But in the greatest instrumental works of recent years, both symphonic and chamber, we may observe schemes of design which follow in direct evolution from those of the "Eroica" and the "Appassionata." They are, of course, much indebted to the experience of the intervening generation; they have borrowed something of its language; they have inspired their phrases with something of its passion; they have learned from it new schemes of colour and new points of style. But in Brahms, especially, we find the heritage of the romantic composers employed to an end which they had not the strength to attain. In balance, in proportion, in organic diversity and coherence, his music owns no rival since the time of the Viennese school; it is at once the climax of past attainment and the pioneer of the future advance. Such works of his as the Sextet in B flat, the first Violin Sonata, and the Clarinet Quintet are typical examples of the stage to which instrumental structure has now attained; and though it be certain that these forms will one day be superseded, as they have superseded others, it is equally certain that from them will their successors be developed.

FROM MY STUDY.

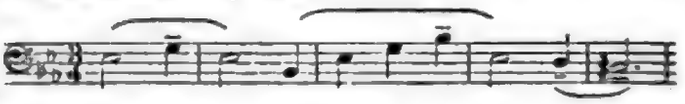
Writing to a friend a short time since, and touching upon the importance of attention to the phrasing in classical music, Mr. Moritz Rosenthal, the distinguished pianist, made the following observations:

"That the chief interest I take in reproductive music lies in the correct phrasing, I confess openly. May I adduce a few examples of well-known and much misunderstood works? A familiar melody of Mozart is usually phrased as below:—

Now it is clear that the 'divine' theme sounds thus as monotonous as possible. I hope to have caught the meaning of the master in the following phrasing—

"In the 'Eroica' Symphony, the common phrasing is (and all great conductors follow this erroneous way)—

This gives the idea four E flats, and a chromatic descent, not to C sharp, but to D flat. It sounds very commonplace. The true reading is most assuredly this—



Here the C sharp opens a strange perspective in an unknown country—the pays du génie.

"A feature in the 'Kreutzer' Sonata is misunderstood by all violinists. They play—and flatter themselves with the funny idea that they have caught the meaning of the immortal composer. But, of course, the melody corresponds to the first two notes, and goes as follows—

The melody in its simplest form is—not—

"In the A flat Valse of Chopin (Op. 42) pianists play—but, of course, this is the noble melody—

"In the 'Sehnsuchts-Walzer' of Schubert I have always heard the following reading—

No doubt it is a pleasure to dance to this rhythm, but the passage should be rendered thus—"

Whatever we may think of the examples cited by Mr. Rosenthal, they at least show how much interest, and possibility of valuable results, attend the study of phrasing in cases where the composer has not fully and definitely expressed his intentions, or has been "edited" without due care.

It is well known to every reader of musical history that Voltaire was a great admirer of Rameau, and that the two masters collaborated, as poet and musician, in "Samson," the "Princess de Navarre," and the "Temple de la Gloire." But it may not be so much a commonplace of record that the greater of the two had ideas about the musical drama which to some extent anticipated those of Gluck. The facts concerning this matter were set forth by Mr. Hugues Imbert in a book entitled "Symphonie Melanges de Critique Littéraire et Musicale" (Paris, 1891).

In 1731 Voltaire began writing the tragedy of "Samson" with a view to the music of Rameau; and here is part of a letter addressed, in 1733, to Berger, secretary of the Prince de Carignan, a nobleman who seems to have acted as patron and protector of the fine arts in Paris.

"You, Sir, the worthy secretary of a Prince who wills to be at the head of our pleasures, and who consequently has the most delightful department in the world, have the kindness, I beg you, to acquaint me when it will be necessary to send him a copy of the words of 'Samson.' I have written that work simply to contribute from afar to the glory of M. Rameau, and to serve his talents, as one who supplies the canvas and the easel contributes to the glory of the painter. But although I play only a subordinate part in this affair, I much desire that there may be no difficulty to overcome, and that I may count personally upon the protection of M. le Prince de Carignan, alike as to the manner in which this opera will be performed and as to the examination of the text. I hope that you will influence him in my favour, and that it will be to you I shall owe the obligation of his kindness."

In a subsequent letter to the same person Voltaire entered more fully into the matter:

"I acted foolishly in writing an opera, but desire to work for a man like M. Rameau carried me away. I thought only of his genius, and did not perceive that mine (if so be that I have one) is not at all adapted for lyrical composition. I wrote to him, some time ago, that I should have made an epic poem much sooner. It is assuredly not that I contemn this kind of work. There is nothing contemptible in it. But it demands a talent which I believe I do not possess. Perhaps with tranquillity of spirit, and the attention and advice of my friends, I might produce something less unworthy of our Orpheus, but I foresee that that would put off the performance of the opera till next winter. This, however, would benefit the work, and make the public more desire it. Our great musician, who, no doubt, has enemies in proportion to his merits, should not be sorry to see his rivals pass before him. The point is not to be played soon, but to succeed. Better be applauded late than hissed early."

Later on, Voltaire spoke of "Samson" in an epistle to his friend the Comte d'Argental: "I had entirely abandoned my hero of the ass's jaw-bone, because of the slight you put upon this rough Hercules and the bizarre poem which bears his name. But Rameau protested; Rameau said that I cut his throat, that I treated him as a Philistine."

In another letter to Thiriot (1735), Voltaire remarked:

"I am told that 'Les Indes,' Rameau's opera, will be a permanent success. The profusion of semiquavers in it will, I think, provoke the Lullists, but in the long run it must be that Rameau's taste will become the dominant taste of the nation, in proportion to the growth of national enlightenment. The ears are formed little by little. Three or four generations change the organs of a nation. Lulli has given us a sense of hearing which we had not, but the Rameaus will bring it to perfection. You will give me news of that in a hundred and fifty years from now."

The affair of "Samson" dragged along a slow course. Rameau does not appear to have been very keen in the matter. He was a little doubtful as to the reception of a Biblical opera by the Church, and also, perhaps, with regard to the prejudice likely to be excited by Voltaire's co-operation. Nevertheless, at the close of 1735, we find the poet-philosopher still full of the theme. He writes again to Thiriot:

"I do not quite understand what is said about an interesting Dalila. I want my Dalila to sing beautiful airs in which French taste is founded upon that of Italy. That is the interest which I have in an opera. A fine and well-varied spectacle, brilliant fêtes, plenty of airs, few recitatives, short acts—that is what pleases me. . . . I wish 'Samson' to be in a new style; only one scene of recitative in each act, no confident, no verbiage. Are you not weary of uniform singing and of the perpetual eu which ends our feminine syllables with a monotony of antiphony? It is a cold poison (un poison froid) which kills our recitative."

At this time came the troubles caused by Voltaire's audacious "La Pucelle," and the author thought it wise to cross the frontier without delay. But he took his anxieties with him. "Amid the sorrow which has pierced my heart, it is difficult, my friend, to think of 'Samson.'" Nevertheless, he did keep that work in mind, for we find him writing to Thiriot:—

"I hope soon to send you the copy of 'Samson.' I persist in the opinion that our operas should serve music more and avoid long recitatives. There are hardly any in 'Samson,' and I believe that the genius of Orpheus-Rameau will, consequently, be more at its ease; but it is necessary to obtain a reasonable censor, who will remember that 'Samson' is designed for the Opéra, not for the Sorbonne. Lend your influence, I pray you, to this new species of opera, and let us say, with Horace, 'O imitatores, servum pecus.'"

In February, 1736, Voltaire sent the following letter to the same correspondent:—

"I have not been able to obtain official sanction for 'Jules César,' only a tacit permission, and that makes me tremble for 'Samson.' The heroes of the fable and of the history are seemingly in an enemy's country. Spite of that, I have worked at 'Samson' ever since I learned that we had gained the battle of Peru.* But Rameau must back me up, and not let himself be influenced by all the asses' jaw-bones that talk to him. Perhaps my latest success will give him confidence in me. I have thought about the matter maturely, and I will not let myself drop into commonplaces. Samson is not a subject susceptible to ordinary love. The more one is accustomed to its intrigues, which are all the same under different names, the more I am resolved to avoid them. I am strongly persuaded that love, in 'Samson,' should be a means, and not the end of the work. It is he, not Dalila, who should interest. That is so true that if Dalila appeared in the fifth act she would be a ridiculous figure. Such an opera, full of spectacle, majesty, and terror, should admit love only as a divertissement. Everything has its own proper character. In a word, I conjure you to let me make of 'Samson' an opera in antique taste. I will answer to M. Rameau for the greater success if he will connect with his beautiful music some airs in a modified Italian manner. Let him reconcile Italy with France."

In another letter appears the following:—

"I have read 'Samson' with Madame du Châtelet, and we are agreed that love, in the first two acts, will have the effect of a flute amidst drums and trumpets. It will be fine to have two acts run on without the jargon of intrigue in the temple of Quinault. I maintain that one treats love with proper respect when one refuses to waste it, and will not introduce it save as an absolute master. When it is not necessary, nothing is more cold. We find that the interest of 'Samson' should fall absolutely on Samson. . . . Moreover, the first two acts will be quite short, and the theatrical terror which there reigns will be to the two acts following as a tempest is to the calm day which comes after it. Wherefore, encourage our Rameau to show all the audacity of his music."

Another letter of the same period, addressed to Berger, deserves quotation:—

"I hope that the indulgence with which my 'Americains' has been received will encourage our great musician, Rameau, to have more confidence in me, and to finish his opera of 'Samson' on the plan that I have all along proposed. I have worked solely for him. I have gone off the ordinary route in the poem because he has done the same in music, and I believe that it is time to open a new career for opera, as for the tragic stage. The beauties of Quinault and Lulli have become commonplace. Few will be bold enough to counsel M. Rameau to make music for an opera the first two acts of which are without love, but he should be bold enough to put himself above prejudice. He ought to believe in me and in himself. He may be assured that the part of Samson, played by Chassé, will make at least as much effect as that of Zamore played by Dufresne. Try to persuade that head of semiquavers that his interest and glory encourage him; that he promised to work entirely in agreement with me; above all, that he will not pass his music about from house to house; that he will adorn with new beauties the pieces I have written for him. I will send him the work whenever he wishes."

Time went on, but "Samson" did not, at least as far as the music was concerned. Rameau soon had his masterpiece, "Castor et Pollux" in hand, and although, still later, he and Voltaire worked together at the "Princesse de Navarre" and "Le Temple de la Gloire" (both written for the Court), the Biblical drama stuck fast. Voltaire, however, could not forget it. As late as 1768 he wrote to a friend: "Do you know that Rameau had made delicious music for 'Samson'? He has put some of it in the 'Incas,' in 'Castor et Pollux,' in 'Zoroastre.'" And there was an end of an enterprise which might have anticipated Gluck, with whom, by the way, Voltaire became acquainted, and whose reforms he supported. Notwithstanding the fiasco of "Samson," it served to place Voltaire, as his letters concerning it show, among the first to advocate dramatic truth in opera, and the subordination of the merely pleasing to the higher ends of art.

* This reference is to the tragedy of "Alzire," about the sanction of which trouble had arisen.

WILLIAM EWART GLADSTONE.

"Music is of enormous advantage both to those who hear and to those who perform it. It is a great blessing to the people, and I think that there are few satisfactions in my mind greater than to witness the progress it has made in the course of the last fifty years." Such is the testimony which the veteran statesman, whose death has caused the hearts of Englishmen to vibrate in sorrowing unison, bore to the influence of music. Although he was in his eighty-eighth year when he uttered these words to 20,000 people gathered under the walls of Hawarden Castle, the views he then expressed were a life-long conviction. Of Mr. Gladstone's personal attainments in the practice of music, it is said that he used to play the violoncello and possessed a charming tenor voice. Judging only from his speaking voice, one can easily believe this to be true. He always showed a very keen appreciation of, and love for the divine art. And in this connection it is interesting to recall the fact that, next to the loving ministrations of those dearest to him, nothing more gently soothed the weariness of the long and painful, but patiently borne sufferings of his last illness than the strains of consoling music. It was not only his constant but only source of enjoyment during many weeks of waiting for his call to higher service.

As a proof of his interest in music and musicians, Mr. Gladstone more than once attended the annual Festival of the Royal Society of Musicians, and at the gathering of 1865 he made a very eloquent and remarkable speech. Unfortunately, his speech was not reported verbatim, but the following digest of it from the journals of the day will furnish some idea of his remarks:—

When the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Gladstone) was called upon to speak the assembly were instantly hushed in breathless expectation; and they were not disappointed, for Mr. Gladstone made a speech full of his glowing and characteristic eloquence. He uttered a fervid eulogy of the art of music, and contrasted the way in which it was regarded in this country, even within his own memory, and the manner in which it is regarded now. Then (he said) music was looked upon as a gift vouchsafed only to a few. Now, it is understood that the gift is extended to the whole human race; those who are destitute of it being below the ordinary standard of humanity; and (he added) our own countrymen are as largely endowed with it as any nation upon earth. Let us cultivate it and promote its progress.

Mr. Gladstone naturally showed a special interest in Church music. In regard to its wonderful progress in this country during his long life, we cannot do better than quote a portion of his speech made at St. James's Palace, February 28, 1882, at a meeting held in connection with the founding of the Royal College of Music, H.R.H. The Prince of Wales being in the chair:—

Now I am bound to say that I take a sanguine view of the capacity of this nation for music. . . . I do not hesitate to say, in looking back over the last half-century, that I have witnessed no change more remarkable among the many changes and the many developments which have marked that half-century, than the change in the sentiment, and, if I may say so, in the attitude of the nation with respect to music. . . . The music in the ordinary churches of the Church of England fifty years ago was a disgrace to the country and to the religion it professed. I remember one particular case, not of an obscure village church, but of a village church hard by one of the ancestral mansions of this country, and where the benefice was held at the time by a member of the family that inhabited the mansion, and in which, in utter despair of redeeming the music of the parish from its disgrace, the alternative had been to extinguish it altogether. The services on Sunday mornings proceeded from beginning to end without a note of music of any kind; and bad as that was, I do not hesitate to say that it was far better than to be doomed to stand and suffer many of the grotesque performances which usually characterised the attempts of that period.

The sentiments so eloquently expressed in the above quotation found an echo in a letter which Mr. Gladstone addressed to Messrs. Novello and Co., in acknowledging a copy of their "Short History of Cheap Music":—

"DEAR SIRS,—I receive your gift with particular pleasure, as proceeding from a firm which is inseparably associated in my mind with the introduction of cheap (instead of frightfully dear) music into this country, and thereby with the remarkable extension of musical taste, knowledge, and practice among the people of this country during the last half-century.

"I remain, Dear Sirs,

"Your very faithful and obedient,

"W. E. GLADSTONE."

"Dollis Hill, N.W.,

"May 18, 1894."

It was characteristic of Mr. Gladstone that he made no reference in the above letter to the important share he had had towards the attainment of this end by the repeal of the Newspaper Stamp Act and the Paper Duty, which helped to bring about the consummation he, in the above letter, so warmly appreciated.

The music arranged to be sung at the funeral of Mr. Gladstone in Westminster Abbey, on the 28th ult., consisted of the following:—

Funeral-Equale for four trombones, Beethoven (composed by him in 1812, and performed at his own funeral in 1827); Funeral March in B minor, Schubert; Funeral March in A flat minor, Beethoven. Opening sentences to music by Croft. Psalm xc. to Chant by Purcell. Hymns: "Rock of Ages," "Praise to the Holiest in the height," and "O God, our Help in ages past," to Croft's fine old tune "St. Ann's." Anthems: "I heard a voice from heaven," Goss; and "Their bodies are buried in peace," Handel. Dead March in "Saul," Handel; Marche Solennelle in E flat, Schubert.

The choir of Westminster Abbey to be augmented by those of the Chapel Royal, St. Paul's Cathedral, the Temple Church, and St. Margaret's, Westminster. The accompaniments to consist of trombones and drums, in addition to the organ. Organist and Director of the music, Professor Sir Frederick Bridge, Mus.D.

ALTHOUGH Dr. Hopkins has relinquished his Sunday duties, it by no means follows that he will henceforth lead a life of idleness. There is every reason to hope and expect that he will devote a portion of his well-earned leisure to the use of his pen. In fact, he has just written a voluntary, characterised by his old familiar charm, for "The Village Organist." And then there is his promised "Handbook on the Organ," "which," he says, "is to appear in the year when I am eighty!" We need hardly say that it is already eagerly anticipated. It should be his magnum opus.

The "Swarry" of the "boiled mutton and usual trimmings" nature, associated with the name of Mr. Samuel Weller, by no means had its counterpart in the "Annual Soirée" given by the bookbinding and printing staffs of Messrs. Novello and Company, Limited, at Novello Works, Soho, on the evening of the 20th ult. The company consisted of about 300 employés of the firm, in addition to the directors and their families and a few of their personal friends. One of the large rooms, about 116 feet long, of the new factory had been most deftly and handsomely transformed from its prosaic work-a-day appearance into a most attractive saloon, where music and dance long held sway. The tasteful decorations of this main apartment and its attendant rooms reflected the greatest credit upon those of the staff who so efficiently carried out what Mr. Weller might naturally have called "the trimmings." The electric light vied with smiling countenances in casting a brightness upon the gay scene quite in harmony with its festive surroundings. The daintily printed programme indicated no less than forty-four numbers, about equally divided between the votaries of Apollo and Terpsichore. An efficient orchestra had no difficulty in inciting lads and lassies—and even some of an older growth—to > Come and trip it as you go

> On the light fantastic toe
> At Novello Works, Soho.

The musical portion of the programme was entirely sustained—and admirably sustained too—by those "in the house." During the evening Mr. Augustus Littleton, one of the directors of Novello and Company, made some genial remarks, in the course of which he humorously compared the present large gathering with that of the first of the series, held twenty years ago, when the said "swarry" partook of the nature of a modest "tea," presided over by himself. He concluded by wishing all present "long life, health, and happiness." Those responsible for the organization of this happy function must be congratulated upon their highly successful efforts in having provided a very enjoyable evening.

The language of the drum, as we know that instrument, is limited. Notwithstanding the extension of its vocabulary by Beethoven—and more especially by Berlioz—the drum for the most part confines its utterances to a modest tonic and dominant; in fact, it is practically a dissyllabic member of the orchestra. It is, therefore, interesting to light upon something out of the beaten track with regard to the drum, even though it comes from a far country and refers to a more primitive instrument than that with which we are familiar. We take the following "drum language" information from our excellent contemporary, the Athenæum:—

Herr R. Betz, a schoolmaster in a Duala village in the Camaroons colony, has devoted four years to a study of the drum language, and is now able to boast that he "understands nearly all that is drummed and is also able to drum himself." The results of his industry are published in the Mittheilungen aus den Deutschen Schutzgebieten, and are well worth perusal. The "drum" consists of a hollowed-out cylinder of red-wood with two slits on the top. Two drumsticks are used, and four notes can be produced by striking different parts of the drum. Words are produced by combining these four notes and varying their duration and strength, and in this manner conversations can be carried on. Public announcements are made by means of this drum-language, and slanders or libels propagated by means of it—a very common practice—are actionable at law, and the fines inflicted are higher than if the slander had been merely by word of mouth. This is only reasonable, for the drum is audible for a long distance. The beats of the drum do not represent letters, as in the Morse code, but words. Thus C F F C means "give gin"; C F F "a demijohn." Herr Betz illustrates his paper with notations of several hundred sentences in the "drum language."

It is impossible to orecast the importance of Herr Betz's interesting discovery. With instruments improved upon the native pattern, and a mastery of their attendant dialect by our native composers, we may reasonably look for some striking developments in the region of orchestral music. Not only will drum concertos be written by the score, but the young bloods will be making a rush on percussionic-symphonic poems. Before the thing becomes a craze, however, perhaps one of our distinguished Scottish composers will, so to speak, turn on the tap gently by composing a Drumtochty Idyll.

We live in a record-breaking age, no doubt, but occasionally, out of a spirit of enthusiasm for the present, are tempted to be oblivious of the records of the past. Thus, for example, àpropos of the benefit concert of Mr. Robert Newman, the excellent and enterprising manager of the Queen's Hall, the Athenæum recently observed that the concert in question made "the 106th performance of his orchestra during the present season," adding, "this fact is, without the shadow of a doubt, unexampled in the history of music in England." Now, so far from there being not the "shadow of a doubt" on the matter, we have really to deal with the rock-like solidity of incontestable certainty. At the Exhibition of 1873, Messrs. Novello undertook to provide a series of daily concerts with orchestra under the direction of the late Sir Joseph Barnby, which opened on Easter Monday, April 14, and lasted till October 31, the date of the closing of the Exhibition, thus consisting of 133 concerts. As for the character of the music discussed, a reference to the bound volume of programmes establishes the fact that the daily menu generally included a symphony or a concerto, two overtures, and vocal solos.

We most heartily congratulate Sir Charles Hubert Hastings Parry upon the honour which Her Majesty the Queen has been pleased to confer upon him. The announcement of this well-merited distinction has been received with general satisfaction in both professional and amateur musical circles. Sir Hubert's music not only reflects his own natural geniality, but it is permeated with those special characteristics which indicate its thoroughly English type, using the word English in its best and widest sense. It is just thirty years ago since the name of Sir Hubert Parry first appeared in The Musical Times. At that time he was known as a Gloucester amateur. Suffice it to say that in the intervening three decades the Director of the Royal College of Music has worthily won and maintained his position as one of our foremost musicians and most distinguished composers. His many friends will cordially wish that his years may be many wherein he may enjoy this newly acquired and highly deserved mark of the Queen's favour.

HAPPY dwellers in Kent! In that pleasant corner of the British Isles the County Council has a bye-law which runs as follows: "No person shall sound or play upon any musical or noisy instrument or sing in any public place or highway within 50 yards of any dwelling-house after being required by any constable or by any inmate of such house personally, or by his or her servant, to desist." A conviction having been obtained under this beneficent decree, an appeal was made against the decision of the local justices. The two judges who heard the appeal differed in their opinion as to the power of any local authority to make such a bye-law. Accordingly the case was brought before the High Court, when seven judges, headed by the Lord Chief Justice, heard the arguments, with the result that the conviction was affirmed and the appeal dismissed. It is most satisfactory to know that this decision was arrived at by a majority of six judges to one—the single dissentient being the judge who had differed from his colleague when the case had been previously brought before him. If the County Council of London would only follow the laudable example of their brethren of the hop county we should jump for joy, and receive the news of our emancipation from the exasperating piano-organ man and others of his ilk with "Kentish fire."

THE discovery of a number of Schubert manuscripts, even if it does not reveal the existence of that additional symphony so firmly believed in by Sir George Grove, must always be a matter of congratulation to music-lovers. There have been found recently by a newly appointed choirmaster of St. Peter's Church, in Vienna, the autographs of a Mass, a Fantasia, and a Rondo for pianoforte duet, unknown hitherto, as well as nine Lieder, already published. In the same press, which had remained unopened for many years, the explorer was further gratified by the discovery of an autograph choral work, with orchestra, completely scored by Beethoven. The latter was at once secured by the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde; while the Schubert MSS., which are said to contain some interesting annotations, will, it is hoped, also be appropriated by one of the Viennese institutions, and are to be shortly published.

FACTS, RUMOURS, AND REMARKS.

MUSIC, as was inevitable, played a prominent part in celebrating the jubilee of Queen's College, London. Mr. Gadsby, one of the professors, composed an anthem for the special service in St. Peter's, Vere Street, on the 1st ult., and conducted a concert of the orchestral class next day. On the 4th, there was a concert by the Old Queen's Society, under Miss Ellen Howard. On the 5th, Mr. Shakespeare had the direction of a vocal concert, supplemented by harp recitals, and followed, as a "wind-up," by a performance of Tasso's "Aminta," with new music by Mr. Gadsby. It is worth while giving these particulars here to show the status assigned to music at the great educational centre in Harley Street. Queen's College may be congratulated upon the value of Mr. Gadsby's services. During many years he has laboured for the Institution with zeal and success, not least in the matter of composition, and, through his works, in giving dignity and importance to the public musical exercises.

I DO not know who are responsible for the arrangements in connection with the Medical, Surgical, and Hygienic Exhibition, which opened in Queen's Hall on the 31st ult., but it is creditable to the authorities that Mr. Borowski, their musical manager, was desired by them to engage an orchestra entirely made up of native performers. Now Borowski is not an English name, and it may be asked why the committee did not put one of our own countrymen in the post of director. The answer is that Mr. Borowski became a naturalised British subject long ago, and therefore entitled to share the privileges as well as the responsibilities of Britons. Again, it may be asked why the committee of an exhibition devoted to the healing art have thought proper to engage a complete orchestra, and prepare for two concerts a day. Well, grave writers have seriously claimed for music a distinct therapeutic value, and thus we have a connection established at once. The main point is, however, the consideration shown for British performers at a time when they are fighting an up-hill battle.

THE committee of the Bristol Festival have taken another step towards the music-meeting of 1899 by issuing a circular asking for a guarantee fund of £4,000, without assurance of which they cannot go on. Bristol and Clifton between them should easily make up the amount in promises, especially as the Festival of 1896 resulted in a profit, the then guarantors escaping scot free. Should the celebration next year be less fortunate, I cannot think so badly of Bristol and Clifton as to suppose that they would pay up in other than a cheerful spirit, rejoicing thus to sustain the local credit and further the cause of art.

A WELCOME to the Worcestershire Philharmonic Society, which gave its first public concert in the county capital on the 7th ult., under the direction of Mr. Edward Elgar. The programme, containing some features of special interest, was altogether above the average in such cases, and the début proved a great success. Should the new Society flourish, as all must hope, it cannot fail to have a good influence upon the Triennial Festival held at Worcester.

IF the people of Bournemouth have not a very wide musical horizon, it is scarcely the fault of those who manage the Winter Gardens. Sixty symphonic concerts were given, under the direction of Mr. Dan Godfrey, Junr., between October 7, 1897, and the 9th ult. In the course of these performances were played fifty-five overtures, forty-nine symphonies, nine pianoforte concertos, nineteen ballet selections, twenty-three suites, eight violin concertos, five violoncello concertos, two flute concertos, and forty-eight pieces described as "Various"—in all, 118 works. The number of English compositions in the list is only twenty, but the achievement is highly to be praised for all that.

THE programme of Mr. Frank Winterbottom's fifth symphony concert at Stonehouse was determined by public vote. Here is the poll: Overtures—"Fidelio," 46; "Month of May," 14; "Son and Stranger," 60; "Rienzi," 82. Solos—"Romance," 31; "Serenade," 51: "Kol Nidrei," 82. Symphonies—"Pathétique," 143; B flat (Beethoven), 4; No. 8 (Beethoven), 12; "Clock" (Haydn), 34; "Unfinished" (Schubert), 55. The miscellaneous pieces need not be cited. From the figures given it appears that the Stonehouse people have a liking for Tschaïkowsky and Wagner, but do not care more than sixteen votes for Beethoven's symphonies.

MENTION has been made in the London papers of a concert of English music at Bologna not long since. I can now give the programme. From Sullivan's works were chosen the Prelude of the "Tempest" music; Stanford was represented by his "Irish" Symphony, Parry by his Symphonic Variations, Mackenzie by his Intermezzo in "The Rose of Sharon," and Cowen by two numbers from his "Suite de Ballet." This was, on the whole, a fair representation of our living composers and their works.

THE opening of the "New Italian Opera House," formerly known as the Olympic Theatre, was promised for June, and Mr. Mapleson has issued a long list of titled and other supporters, together with a catalogue of the works to be produced. That, apparently, is as far as we have got, and further developments are anxiously awaited.

I HEAR from Wimborne good accounts of music in the Minster. There have been two great festival services, one in Advent, when Spohr's "Last Judgment" was performed, and one at Easter, with the "Hymn of Praise" as its most conspicuous feature. A correspondent writes that 1,300 persons attended the first and contributed £15 to the offertory; whereas, at the second, the congregation numbered 1,600, and the "bags" produced £30. Mr. J. Edis Tidnam, organist of the Minster, is to be congratulated for thus helping to wake up the "sleepy South."

THE American monthly, Music, publishes "An Interview with David Bispham." One has a right to be cautious in receiving these reports, which have no great character for accuracy, but it may be noted—with some grains of salt at hand—that Mr. Bispham gave his opinion on various subjects. He thinks that opera in America will go "hand in hand with the future of America," which is not unlikely. He thinks excitement is "a necessity of the human race," but does not tell us how much of it is safe. He thinks it is not very easy to find serious-minded Americans who know anything about music. Mr. Bispham may have said this, and much more set down to him, but he could not have said that "Schumann came to England with his wife." That must be the interviewer's own.

I READ in an American journal that the Rev. Dr. Smith, author of "My country, 'tis of thee," wrote that national hymn to a tune which he found in an old music-book. The tune was that of "God save the Queen," and Dr. Smith declares he did not know it as such. Where in the world had he been living?

MR. FFRANGCON-DAVIES'S "cantillations" have not pleased all his American critics. The Concert-Goer says:—

I have great admiration for Mr. Davies as an artist; he is intelligent and thorough and sings really well; but I am sorry he has not been content to stick to legitimate vocal art instead of taking up something which cannot create more than a passing interest at least. We have quite enough elocutionists as it is without our singers joining the already overcrowded ranks of those somewhat annoying persons. The subjects chosen for these cantillations are of the most gruesome description. They deal with violent death, purgatory, hell, lost souls, broken hearts, and all such pleasing things so capitally calculated to send one forth refreshed and rejoiced from the concert-room.

"So many men, so many minds." Here is an American critic who, after lavishing praise upon some chamber music of the Russian school, refers thus to Beethoven's Quartet in A minor: "I beg the classicists to pardon my brutal frankness when I declare that I found an almost hopelessly cold, mechanical, and joy-killing composition. It had moments of light, certainly, through the thick clouds of its obscurity, and we accepted those with due gratitude, but we were all glad when it was over. I believe the Kneisels played this particular quartet with the sole purpose of mitigating our grief at bidding them good-bye." As a classicist, I will not only pardon these remarks, which are evidently honest, but will pray that his judgment may be better informed. An American writer, after hearing Weingartner's "Fields of the Blessed," dismisses it thus: "I hope that I shall never have to remain long in Elysium if I am to hear nothing more soothing there than such vague meanderings as Weingartner's."

JOSEPH BENNETT.

DR. E. J. HOPKINS'S "NUNC DIMITTIS."

"ON this day Dr. Hopkins, the honorary organist, will preside at the organ, the previous day being the fifty-fifth anniversary of his first service at the Temple Church." Thus ran the announcement which appeared in the music list of the far-famed Temple Church under the date of the 8th ult. No wonder that the venerable sanctuary was crowded at both services on so memorable an occasion. If the record is not unique, it is very rare, especially in London, for an organist to have held an appointment for fifty-five years. And in the case of Dr. Hopkins everyone will admit that it has been held with distinction, the Temple Church having been for many years a veritable Mecca to church organists. We had the pleasure of giving a biographical sketch of Dr. Hopkins in our issue of September last. Therefore there is no need to refer to the incidents of his long career. Suffice it to say that on May 7, 1843, when he played his first service at the Temple Church, he was a young man nearly twenty-five; and that now, just upon the completion of his eightieth year, he has a perennial sprightliness which many a man half his age might envy.

It was distinctly appropriate that all the music sung on this "Nunc Dimittis" occasion should be selected from the compositions of the veteran organist. The opening voluntary in the morning was the Adagio Cantabile in D. The service throughout the day was Hopkins in A — Te Deum, Jubilate, Cantate, and Deus. This service, although composed more than forty years ago, possesses a genial freshness while preserving the best traditions of the English Church school—that is to say, music that is vocal and grateful to the singer. The anthem in the morning was "The King shall rejoice," composed by Dr. Hopkins to celebrate the marriage of the Prince of Wales in 1863, the Prince being a Bencher of the Temple. The hymn before the sermon was "Nearer, my God, to Thee," sung to the tune "Whiteford." The sermon, entitled "The good and perfect gift" (James c. i. v. 17), preached by Dr. Hopkins's old friend and fellow-worker, Canon Ainger, the Master of the Temple, was worthy of the occasion. Through the kindness of Canon Ainger we are enabled to give the following extracts from his discourse, having special reference to the hero of the day. After alluding to the restoration of the sacred edifice in 1842, Canon Ainger proceeded to refer to the music thus:—

A young musician—one of a family of notable musicians—was appointed to improve the music—and he revolutionised it. We are so accustomed in these days to choral service, of what used to be called the "Cathedral" type, that we may easily forget how great was the novelty, as well as the charm, to the general public of fifty years ago, of such a service, in which, by the courtesy of the "two learned Societies of this House," they were allowed to take part as worshippers. Indeed, such services were then rightly known as "Cathedral," for I believe I am right in saying that when introduced into the Temple Church, it caused the church to stand alone in this respect among the churches of London, with the single exceptions of St. Paul's, Westminster Abbey, and the Chapels Royal.

And from this date (almost to a day fifty-five years ago) the fame of the Temple Church, for unique historical associations, for architectural beauty, for the rare art and perfection of its music, continued to increase.

You are all aware of the particular interest attaching to this day. It is not possible, as you will well understand, to say all one would, in his presence, of a dear and valued colleague who, after an unprecedented period of loyal service, is leaving us, full of years and of honours, happily, too, with health and strength unimpaired, to enjoy, as we trust, many years of that repose he has so nobly earned. But he will forgive me, I know, if I lay stress upon the special quality of the obligation he has put upon us—the special service that he has rendered to the music of this church far beyond even that of a rare technical knowledge and instrumental execution, and an even rarer gift of melodic invention. The quality I speak of—and I will rather call it a grace than a quality, for it is in the deepest, truest sense a "spiritual gift" as much as those reckoned up by St. Paul—is the grace of invariable self-suppression, of the subordination of musical display to the highest purpose of divine worship. If we, my brethren, have ever fallen into the error of mistaking the purpose for which the divine gift of "Sunday" was instituted, it was never from our organist that we learnt it. It is from the devout among our congregations, not the undevout, that I would seek the fitting tribute to the worth of his long service. They will tell you (as they have often told me) that church was to them "a little Heaven below," just because they were never tempted by anything in the music they heard there to give to man's art or skill a higher place in their affections than to that atmosphere of reverence, of spiritual loveliness, and of spiritual comfort which such art and skill shed abundantly around them. For this gift of his, and for all we owe to it, we tender to our friend our heartfelt gratitude and affection.

The concluding voluntary at the morning service was the Allegro moderato in A.

The afternoon service, the last official act of the organist of four-score years, was a specially interesting occasion. Not only was there a large number of organists and choirmasters in the congregation, but the presence of several of Dr. Hopkins's sightless pupils from the Royal Normal College and School for the Blind, at Norwood, gave an unusually pathetic tinge to this valedictory service. The opening voluntary was the Andante Grazioso in A flat, and the anthem, "God who commanded the light to shine out of darkness," composed for the recovery of the Prince of Wales, 1872. One of the most attractive features of Dr. Hopkins's organistship at the Temple has been his extemporaneous introductions to the anthem. And on this leave-taking Sunday he worthily upheld the old traditions. Age naturally weakens physical power, but on this occasion the "father of English organists" was in his grand old extemporaneous form. The hymn before the sermon was "Lead us, Heavenly Father, lead us," sung to the tune "Feniton Court," so named after Judge Paterson's seat near Ottery St. Mary, Devonshire, Dr. Hopkins having composed it while on a visit there. This devotional tune, so simple in its melodic and harmonic beauty, caused the chords of human emotion to vibrate in the heart of many a worshipper. It was sung very slowly, the rich volume of tone from the men's voices in the congregation giving it fine effect. The final voluntary was the Allegro Finale in A, followed, however, by the National Anthem. Thus ended a splendid achievement of noble service covering fifty-five years within the historic fane of the Temple Church.

CHURCH MUSIC.

OF the many services rendered to the advancement of sacred art by earnest and well-advised lovers of Church music, no more striking and uplifting influence has been in evidence of late years than the frequent employment of the orchestra at great festivals in St. Paul's Cathedral. It has been upon these occasions that many have realised the eloquence and majesty of the greatest of all musical combinations—a fine choir, an effective orchestra, and the stately sounds of the organ. Such a combination Mendelssohn is said to have pronounced as the finest thing on earth; and when heard under the great and inspiring surroundings of our metropolitan Cathedral such music becomes a gift of priceless value.

On the 11th ult. the Festival of the Sons of the Clergy took place, with the accustomed imposing effects, under the direction of Sir George Martin. Sullivan's Overture "In Memoriam" was, as usual, the Prelude; Professor Villiers Stanford's fine Evening Service in A and Schubert's "Song of Miriam," with, we presume, the added and not altogether satisfactory instrumentation attributed to Lachner, were the leading musical features of the great service.

Recently at St. Andrew's Church, Pau, Mendelssohn's "Lobgesang" and Gounod's "Gallia" were effectively given, under the direction of the organist, Mr. Luard, the orchestra consisting of over twenty members of Mons. Brunel's Municipal orchestra.

Sir John Stainer's effective cantata "The Daughter of Jairus," so appropriate to the period of Eastertide, was given at Keighley Parish Church on the 10th ult. At St. Luke's Church, Sydney, New South Wales, Mr. Lee Williams's oratorio "Gethsemane" was recently given, under the direction of Mr. A. Gough. Stainer's cantata "The Crucifixion" was also sung upon a recent occasion at the same church. The earnest cultivation of Church music is one of the notable "onward movements" at Sydney at the present time.

At Brixton Church what was called a "Special Orchestral Service" was held on the 1st ult., the music including one of Schubert's overtures and Mendelssohn's noble Overture to "Athalie"; which might find a place in our Church festival schemes much more frequently than it does at present.

The Dedication Festival at St. Philip's, Queen's Road, Battersea, took place on the 1st ult. The music at Matins included Smart's Te Deum in F, "Hail, Festal Day" (Baden Powell), Sir George Martin's 150th Psalm, and Gounod's "Messe Solennelle." At Evensong the Canticles were sung to the setting by Gounod in D. The anthem was "Let their celestial concerts all unite" (Handel), and after the blessing Mendelssohn's "Elijah" (Part I.) was given. The soloists were Masters Winterflood and Williams, Messrs. Frederick Ward (tenor) and Harry Weston (bass). The accompaniments were efficiently played on the organ by Mr. Frank Heavens, organist and choirmaster of Grosvenor Chapel, South Audley Street. Mr. B. Heaviside, organist of the church, conducted.

The London Church Choir Association held a Festival Service in St. Saviour's Collegiate Church, Southwark, on April 28, when a choir of 400 voices assembled for Evensong, under the direction of Dr. A. Madeley Richardson, organist of the church. The Canticles were sung to Field in D; the anthem was "Lord, Thou art God," Stainer; and the service concluded with Sir George Martin's Jubilee Te Deum. The twenty-fifth annual festival of the Association will be held on Thursday, November 17, 1898, in St. Paul's Cathedral. The music for the Canticles will be specially written for the occasion by Dr. E. J. Hopkins, and the anthem will be composed by Mr. Myles B. Foster. The musical arrangements are under the direction of Sir George Martin, organist of St. Paul's, and hon. conductor of the Association.

Entirely within the scope of these remarks is an acknowledgment of the excellent work done by the Kyrle Society in giving very effective renderings of the classic oratorios, &c., in our London churches, more especially for the benefit of poor congregations. Indeed, it is not too much to say that in this direction the Kyrle Society has during the past twenty years done more than any other musical body in the beneficent work of bringing the oratorio to its original home, the church. The choral force of the Society is of excellent materials, well-trained and skilfully directed by Mr. F. A. W. Docker. The soloists number not a few of our most useful professional singers; and one good feature of the work done is the fact that many young vocalists of high promise have found in these performances an excellent experience in oratorio methods and traditions. From both philanthropical and artistic points of view, the Kyrle Society well deserves high praise and earnest support.

There is a revived interest in the Masses of Haydn and Mozart; and, indeed, some of the best of these, as Mozart's First Mass, which has been recently sung in several important Catholic churches, including the London Oratory, well deserve frequent use and a permanent place in the rich stores of Church music set to Latin words, notwithstanding the ill-advised treatment in many instances of the text in such solemn passages as the Kyrie Eleison and "Dona nobis pacem." The eminent architect, Welby Pugin, led quite a crusade against the employment of Masses displaying such treatment of the sacred text. The violation of good sense in this regard was no doubt brought about by the excessive preponderance of ornate music intended to be pleasant to listen to in the private chapels of the "great ones of the earth," an abuse the clergy frequently protested against with marked earnestness.

The proposed testimonial to Dr. Longhurst, in recognition of his seventy years' service at Canterbury Cathedral, first as chorister and subsequently as organist, will take the form of a silver salver, an illuminated address, and a purse of money. The inscription on the salver will be surmounted by the arms of the Cathedral and the arms of the city of Canterbury engraved together, in token that the Cathedral body unite with the citizens in doing honour to one who has earned the esteem and regard of all, alike ecclesiastical and civil. The presentation will be made on the 8th inst., by the Mayor of Canterbury, the Dean and Chapter kindly offering the use of the Cathedral Library for the purpose.

On Sunday evening, 22nd ult., Barnby's "Rebekah" was performed at Essex Church, Kensington, with augmented choir. The soloists were Miss Carrie Blackwall, Mr. Sinclair Dunn, and Mr. Albert Norcross.

ORGAN MUSIC.

The late Mr. W. T. Best once earnestly protested against public statements and discussions concerning organists' and other musical artists' salaries and fees, as undignified and injurious. The good people of Sydney, New South Wales, would seem to hold an opinion quite different from that of the great organist just named. The city organist, Mons. A. Wiegand, has been recently "called into court," so to speak, to listen to a proposal to reduce his salary, and to be subjected to a certain amount of criticism concerning the character of his recitals, more especially from what is called the educational point of view. As M. Wiegand has obviously striven to make his recitals popular and consequently lucrative, it seems somewhat unkind to have taken him rather sharply to task and to seriously propose to reduce his stipend, when the original intention of his engagement was the creation of a popularly attractive form of recital, and his employers, as far as can be gathered, were hardly prepared to encourage the educational type of organ recital, which is a form of entertainment not calculated to pay from the financial point of view. The discussion was evidently conducted by the Sydney organist and his employers' representatives, sundry members of the Corporation, with a good deal of spirit and with no small amount of pleasant badinage. As a characteristic sequel, M. Wiegand played some extempore variations on "Pop goes the weasel" at a subsequent recital—a significant and practical commentary upon the possible "popular" employment of the resources of the "largest organ in the world." It is fair to the Sydney organist to add that he was tempted to this display of musical fancy by the words "Pop goes the weasel" being needlessly dragged into the controversy regarding his position. The incident suggests the question, what may or may not be played on the organ? No information is at hand as to the result of the discussion.

Mr. Roger Ascham has given a long series of recitals up to the present time at Feather Market Hall—a name which rightly or wrongly suggests a connection with the ostrich feather trade—Port Elizabeth, South Africa. His programmes have been excellent; recent schemes have included too much neglected specimens of E. T. Chipp's organ music, Rheinberger's Sonata in A minor (Op. 98), Guilmant's "Marche Religieuse" on the initial figure of Handel's chorus "Lift up your heads," and a transcription by Mr. Ascham of the Scherzo on a pedal bass or single bass note, from a manuscript Sonata in F for pianoforte à quatre mains by Pettersson. From another distant place—Montreal, Canada—we learn that Mr. W. Reed lately gave a recital at the American Presbyterian Church. His programme included two excellent specimens of British organ music in Sir R. P. Stewart's highly effective Concert Fantasia and Mr. J. E. West's Sketch in C minor. Another scheme included J. Hatton's Impromptu in E and works by such standard composers of organ music as Bach, Handel, Lemmens, and Salomé.

Very interesting are the schemes of a series of "Orgel-Foredrag" given by Mr. Albert Mallinson, a pupil of Dr. Creser, at the Jesuskirken at Valby, Copenhagen. In addition to selections from Bach, Handel, &c., and sundry modern French composers of organ music, Edward Bache's Andante and Allegro in D, Chipp's Canzonetta, S. S. Wesley's Andante, W. Creser's "Melodia," Dudley Buck's "At Evening," not to add some effective transcriptions, appear in these programmes.

A specially good programme was played by Mr. W. S. Hoyte at the opening of the admirable organ at St. James's, Piccadilly. The scheme included Bach's Prelude and Fugue in B minor, Kauffmann's Fantasia, Variations, and Fugue, Gottschalk's Meditation, Hollins's Grand Chœur, and E. d'Evry's Meditation. Mr. Ernest Newton played, at the opening of Messrs. J. W. Walker's fine new instrument in St. Thomas's Church, Portman Square, on the 8th ult., a selection which included Mendelssohn's First Sonata and Saint-Saëns's "Benediction Nuptiale." Mr. E. H. Lemare's Recital, on the 4th ult., at St. Margaret's, Westminster, included such notable transcriptions as Brahms's Academic Festival Overture and a Wagner selection, with Mr. d'Evry's new Meditation and Toccata, movements by Mr. A. Hollins, and his own Romance in D flat. At Holy Trinity Church, Richmond, Mr. F. Curry recently played a selection including Lachner's March in B flat, and a revival of interest in an Allegro from an Organ Concerto by Dr. Dupuis. Mr. T. Keighley's recent programme at Albion New Church, Ashton-under-Lyne, contained two of Dr. Hiles's Impromptus, pieces of marked value.

There was a very interesting meeting at the Royal Manchester College of Music on Wednesday evening, the 11th ult., when Mr. Pyne gave an opening recital upon the large organ which Miss Dorothy Lees has presented in memory of her father, who was so liberal a benefactor of the Institution. Messrs. Wadsworth have supplied an admirable instrument for concert purposes, of four manuals and pedal clavier, including thirty-one speaking stops. The more sonorous reeds are of rich, full tone, and the cor Anglais is delightful, although the clarinet on the solo register is, perhaps, a little coarse, and the mixtures might be subdued slightly. It need not be reported that Mr. Pyne with great skill displayed the instrument, which is so valuable an acquisition to the College, and with its handsome case, designed by Mr. E. Salomons, forms a noble finish to the embellishments of the pretty concert-room.

At the Parish Church, Blackburn, Mr. J. H. Rook's programme included Overture, Merkel; Aria and alla Marcia, Sir Alexander Mackenzie; and Fugue, Boëly. The organ in this church is a notable specimen of the fine workmanship of Cavaillé-Coll of Paris. Mr. E. Smith played an effective selection at the recent opening of the new organ at the Devonshire Square Baptist Church, including one of the Preludes and Fugues by Bach in C and a Festal March by King Hall. Mr. H. E. Carver, assistant-organist of St. George's Chapel Royal, at the opening of the new organ in St. Paul's Church, Maidenhead, played a selection of music chiefly of the modern French school, features of his scheme being Allegretto in F sharp minor, Guilmant, and Offertoire on an Easter Hymn, Batiste. At the Kentish Town Congregational Church Mr. R. T. Gibbons gave a recital on the 21st ult. His selection included Liszt's Triumphal March, "From Crag to Sea," one of the few possible and effective organ transcriptions to be made from this composer's works. Mr. Rudolph Loman's programme at the recent monthly recital at the Dutch Church, Austin Friars, contained the Organ Sonata in D minor by Alphonse Mailly.

Mr. Allan Paterson, organist of Govan Parish Church, Glasgow, inaugurated the new organ at Thornliebank Parish Church, on the 13th ult. His programme contained Handel's Concerto in D minor, one of the most interesting specimens of the kind by the master; Tours's excellent Allegretto Grazioso; and Smart's Allegro Pomposo in G. The programme was altogether a good one.

At St. Mary's Parish Church, upon the occasion of the opening of the Eton House by H.R.H. Princess Christian at Victoria Park, on May 12, Mr. D. A. Fox gave an organ recital.

ROYAL OPERA, COVENT GARDEN.

THE summer opera season at Covent Garden—it can no longer be called "Italian"—was commenced on the 9th ult., and the first three weeks have been remarkable for the number of works mounted. The attention was first called to the re-arrangement of the orchestra, the heavy brass instruments having been placed in an alcove under the stage on either side of the prompter's box, and the conductor's seat being moved back, enabling him to face the whole of his orchestra. This has proved a decided improvement and has greatly contributed to the better balance of tone that has on most occasions prevailed. M. van Dyck appeared as the Knight of the Swan on the first night. Madame Eames, whose voice this year seems to have gained in richness of quality, presented Elsa as a dark-haired daughter of fair Brabant, and Telramund introduced Herr Feinhals, a fine baritone singer with a very German manner.

The following evening "Romeo et Juliette" brought three new vocalists. Miss Suzanne Adams, who personated Juliette, sang with great charm of vocal tone and style, M. Saléza, as Romeo, made a most favourable impression by reason of the good quality of his voice and the earnestness of his acting, and Miss Fanchon Thompson, who rendered Stephano's fateful song in a manner that indicated ability to sustain more important characters.

Both these operas were conducted by Signor Mancinelli; but on the next night the baton was handed to Herr Hermann Zumpe, and there was a notable falling away in the orchestral playing. The work was "Die Walküre," and some allowance may be made for Herr Zumpe's slight acquaintance with his forces; but his direction of other performances, although more successful, was characterised by similar want of grip and slovenliness of phrasing. The twins on this occasion were embodied by Herr Costa and Frau Cziuk, both estimable artists, who thoroughly know the business of their parts, though neither possesses the vocal means to meet all the requirements of a Covent Garden audience. Miss Brema as Brünnhilde was superb, and Herr van Rooy, who made his first appearance here as Wotan, caused that character to be quite acceptable.

Criticism is scarcely called for concerning the performance of "Faust" on the 12th ult. Madame Eames and M. Bonnard sustained the principal characters.

The title-rôle of "Carmen," on the 13th ult., was sustained with vivacity and point by Mdlle. Zelie de Lussan. Miss Suzanne Adams was a demure Micaela, and M. Saléza, as Don José, increased the good opinions he had previously earned. M. Flon conducted.

The climax of the week was attained on the following night, when M. Jean de Reszke and Madame Nordica made their appearance in "Tristan und Isolde," with Miss Marie Brema as Brangäne and Herr van Rooy as Kurwenal. M. Jean de Reszke's embodiment was vocally superb, and although Madame Nordica scarcely realised the white heat of Isolde's passion in the first act, she vocalised her music with impressive beauty. The somewhat rough quality of Herr van Rooy's voice added force to his impersonation of Kurwenal, and save for the roughness with which the orchestral portion was played, under the direction of Herr Zumpe, the performance was excellent.

The only other operas calling for mention are "Philémon et Baucis" and "Orphée," both sung in French, on the 17th ult.; "Tannhäuser," presented on the 20th ult.; and "Die Meistersinger," mounted on the following evening. Miss Marie Engle appeared as Baucis in "Philémon," and Miss Marie Brema sustained the title-rôle of "Orphée" with her usual earnestness, but not altogether in a manner to efface the recollection of Signorina Ravogli's beautiful embodiment. M. van Dyck was the exponent of Tannhäuser, with Mdlle. Pacary as Elizabeth and Mdlle. Ganne as Venus, the last being a new-comer of good presence and fair voice. MM. Jean and Edouard de Reszke appearing as Walther and Hans Sachs, with Madame Eames as Eva, made the performance of "Die Meistersinger" memorable. The orchestra, under Signor Mancinelli, played admirably; but the Beckmesser of M. Soulacroix was too grotesque, and the chorus, as hitherto, showed its usual disinclination to move in the street fight.

ROYAL CHORAL SOCIETY.

A MORE effective interpretation of Sir Arthur Sullivan's dramatic cantata "The Golden Legend" has rarely been given than that which took place on the 5th ult., at the Albert Hall. The members of the Royal Choral Society mustered in full force and sang with magnificent precision, dramatic force, and wealth of tone. The pitch in the "Evening Hymn" was admirably maintained, but a determined effort on the part of the audience to have the beautiful number repeated was frustrated by Sir Frederick Bridge boldly making an appeal that the continuity of the work might not be disturbed, which had the effect of silencing the thoughtless and noisy. The charming quality of Miss Esther Palliser's voice and her sympathetic style peculiarly fit her for the part of Elsie, and the chaste and pure character of her music has never been more happily realised. Signorina Giulia Ravogli also delivered the airs and passages assigned to Ursula with fine appreciation of the devout resignation which characterises the music. Mr. Edward Lloyd was, as usual, an ideal Prince Henry; Mr. Andrew Black declaimed the words of Lucifer with his customary success, and Mr. Charles Ackerman was a most efficient Forester.

The cantata was preceded by the second performance by this Society of the conductor's setting of Mr. Rudyard Kipling's stirring ballad "The Flag of England," one of the few works which promise to be remembered of the many written in celebration of the Queen's sixty years' reign. Miss Esther Palliser was less successful in this work, and in truth a voice of exceptional strength and penetrating quality is required to cut its way through a chorus of some 800 voices directed to sing forte; but in less exacting and more expressive portions Miss Palliser gave effective expression to the composer's melodious strains. The choir, of course, sang with zeal, and the clever work received such hearty and prolonged applause that Sir Frederick Bridge, who conducted, had to return to the platform and bow his acknowledgments.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

A NEW American pianist and a new English composition were the attractions for the concert of April 28. Of these the second should deserve first consideration, but—place aux dames! Madame Bloomfield-Zeisler's début in England was heralded by a great flourish of trumpets in the shape of fulsome eulogisms quoted from more or less obscure American papers, preliminary puffs in which she was compared with, and even extolled above, some of the greatest European pianists. This sort of thing avails little in this country, and after hearing our new visitor in Rubinstein's D minor Concerto (No. 4) we consider that she was found wanting. There is no denying the agility of her fingers or the charm of her touch and phrasing, especially in quiet, expressive passages; but where sustained power and brilliant aplomb were required her performance could not compare with that of, say, Mr. Frederic Lamond, who last played this Concerto in the same hall, and by his superb virtuosity almost misled us into considering Rubinstein's tuneful but somewhat cheaply effective effusion a masterpiece. Madame Bloomfield-Zeisler was much better in the Scherzo from Litolff's Pianoforte Concerto (No. 4, Op. 102), which she rattled off with a delightful clockwork precision, suggesting an excellent wrist action and a good sense of rhythm. Mr. F. H. Corder's dramatic scene for orchestra "Pippa passes," founded chiefly on Scene ii. of Browning's poem, proved a disappointment. He composes so little that, knowing his gifts as we do, we looked forward to a ripe, masterly work, free from all traces of haste in conception or execution. We listened to his music attentively and expectantly, but could not rise above a dutiful admiration of the clever composer's cleverness. His subject suggests great possibilities in the hands of a free-lance who would not hesitate to attempt reproducing the story in all its naked brutality; a musician, we mean, who would dare to ask his orchestra to play "gemein," if needs be, as Richard Strauss has been known to do. But Mr. Corder's passion does not move us; it does not even shock us; and after enduring it and smiling at the last word spoken or rather breathed through the "am'rous flute" by that "babbling egotist" the Cuckoo, we shrug our shoulders with a cui bono? The work opens ineffectively with an oboe melody, which is intended to represent Pippa's wonderful song "The year's at the spring," but somehow fails to suggest the exquisite "Morgenstimmung," as Grieg would say, of Browning's famous lyric. It is sadly lacking in spontaneity, and few of the themes in the subsequent Allegro molto appassionato have the power to move us and make us partake, as it were, in the scene which the music vainly endeavours to portray. That Mr. Corder's workmanship is quite exceptional and his orchestration worthy of the author of an excellent handbook on that branch of our art need hardly be affirmed. Mr. Plunket Greene sang two songs, "Come away, Death," and "The Battle of Pelusium," by Professor Stanford, and provided with orchestral accompaniments for this occasion. In the case of the Shakespeare song, a lugubrious setting has been made even more lugubrious by an orchestral colouring in which the very depths of despair seem to be sounded, and sighs and moans alone come from the muted strings. The battle song (splendidly declaimed by Mr. Greene), on the other hand, proved very stirring and effective. Sir Alexander Mackenzie conducted Brahms's F major Symphony, and secured a sonorous performance of this noble masterpiece. But we cannot agree with the very slow tempo (frequently tempo rubato!) which he adopted for the delightful Poco allegretto. The movement, one of the most spontaneous Brahms ever penned, did not make its customary effect in consequence.

Herr Moritz Moszkowski, beloved of musical amateurs, old and young, in general, and Philharmonic audiences in particular, came on the 12th ult. as a pianist—came, saw, and conquered. It was his English début in this character, and a most successful one. He is a fascinating player. His technique seems perfect; wonderful facility and brilliancy, a beautiful touch, absolute accuracy, and, thrown over all, the spell of a sympathetic, unaffected personality—no wonder the audience, and especially the large contingent of delighted musical students, rose at him. His new Concerto in E was evidently "made to measure," for it fitted him like a glove. We do not expect heaven-sent inspirations from Moszkowski, and his latest work does not disappoint us in that respect. But we look, nor look in vain, for esprit, tunefulness, brightness, brilliancy in what he produces, and we are happy to find ourselves in the presence of a composer who writes as he feels, who never strikes attitudes, or goes beyond his depth, but aims at charming our senses with melodious, euphonious, and artistically-made music. The concerto, which is in four instead of the more usual three movements, may perhaps be no great work, but it is almost sure to become popular; certainly it was an emphatic success on the 12th ult., when the composer was four times recalled. He also played three short drawing-room pieces of his own, and conducted three short, catchy, and beautifully scored movements from his ballet "Laurin." M. Emile Sauret gave a refined performance of Beethoven's Violin Concerto; Signorina Marcella Pregi sang two airs by Handel and Mozart in artistic style, but with a small and not very sympathetic voice; and Sir Alexander Mackenzie conducted, besides the Concerto, a finished performance of Mendelssohn's "Melusina" Overture. There was no symphony, and nobody seemed to miss it!

RICHTER CONCERTS.

"DEAR old Richter," back once more at dear old St. James's Hall; a sultry, breathless night, a brilliant audience that seems to include everybody who is somebody in musical London; a programme commencing with the glorious C major chord of the "Meistersinger" Overture, and closing with the no less glorious C major chord of Brahms's First Symphony; superb performances, enthusiasm warm and wild, and a noisy, noisome nigger minstrel in the yard outside! Such is the typical Richter concert, and such was the first of this season's four concerts on the 23rd ult. The great conductor, still facile princeps amongst the gentlemen who "make music with a stick" (to quote a little friend of ours), was in splendid form, and the delighted audience tried hard, yet tried in vain, to encore the very first piece on the programme. Nothing could have excelled the playing of the orchestra in the extremely difficult, "tricky" Symphonic Suite "Scheherazade," by Rimsky-Korsakoff (Op. 35), which was given for the first time at these concerts, and proved another addition to the lengthy list of Russian works that seem all masterly technique, bewildering arabesques, put together, or rather side by side, in the most whimsical fashion; strange, wayward rhythms, and brilliant, glaring colour, produced by the most daring orchestral devices, frequently new and beautiful, ever and anon bizarre and childish, but always calculated with quite uncanny certainty. Verily, the average Russian composer, he of the band of real Russians, who look askance at Tschaïkowsky as "under foreign influence," is a past master of the gentle art of making bricks without straw! Strip this precious Suite of its glittering orchestral garb and search for what we Westerners consider the kernel and substance, the very heart and soul of music, Melody, and there seems not enough to furnish material for a Strauss waltz. There are some pretty tunes in the two middle movements, and we greatly admire one splendid passage of real grandeur near the end of the work, where the shipwreck on the Loadstone Rock is depicted in the most graphic and powerful manner. But the rest is notes, notes et præterea nihil! Even the wonders of the brilliant orchestration soon pall, even as to look into the sun becomes unendurable after a short while, and we rebel against the utter lack of emotional qualities in a very lengthy work. Do Slavonic music-lovers admire this kind of music, we wonder, and must we Anglo-Saxons, Celts, and Teutons first become Slavs before we can appreciate these strange effusions at their full and proper value? We suppose our Russian friends do derive some satisfaction from them, something more, we mean, than a mere tickling of the senses. To us, we confess it with sorrow and all due humility, they seem like "linked boredom long drawn out," to vary a famous quotation. Brahms's C minor Symphony supplied the longed-for contrast to Rimsky-Korsakoff's piece, and never has the great master's magnificent epic seemed greater or moved us more deeply than on this occasion. Its glories seemed to "bring all Heav'n before our eyes," as its ravishing beauties and touching accents brought tears into them. It was grandly played.

WAGNER CONCERTS.

MR. SCHULZ-CURTIUS'S concerts have become an institution and one without which a London musical season would appear robbed of one of its greatest attractions. The programmes arranged for the present season, if not so interesting as usual, are still distinctly strong and varied, as witness that of the first concert, given at Queen's Hall on April 26, when Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony, Beethoven's "Leonora" (No. 3) Overture, a lengthy Wagner selection, and two dances from Rubinstein's "Feramors" were the purely orchestral pieces. Of these the symphony, as conducted by Herr Mottl, proved the most interesting, on account of the slow tempi adopted by him in the opening Allegro and the Menuet. These movements gained thereby in stately dignity and repose what they lost in brightness, buoyancy, and warmth, and if they sounded somewhat "stodgy" and cold to us, who have become used to quicker readings, we daresay that Herr Mottl's tempi were probably more nearly those intended by Mozart. The Adagio was perfectly phrased, and "sung" with beautiful tone, and the final Fugue went with rare brilliancy and entrain. In the "Flying Dutchman" Overture and the "Kaisermarsch," Herr Mottl's fondness for "brassy" effects, often exaggerated into sheer ear-splitting noise, was as marked as ever, and once more we refused to reconcile ourselves to his tempo rubato reading of the magnificent march. The dances from "Feramors," delightful specimens of Rubinstein in his proper element, were played with all possible finish and greatly relished. Miss Ella Russell sang Leonora's great air ("Fidelio"), that matchless song of wedded love than which nothing more moving ever came even from Beethoven's pen. Here is an inspiration worthy of the greatest singers' art, and yet how few attempt its difficulties, executive and interpretative! All honour, then, to Miss Russell, both for her choice of a most exacting solo and a finished and impressive performance. She also sang the part of Senta in a selection (Spinning chorus and Ballad) from the "Flying Dutchman," in which a chorus of ladies and Miss Rosa Green assisted with good effect.

At the concert of the 17th ult. we seemed to feel > . . . like some watcher of the skies

> When a new planet swims into his ken.

Herr Felix Weingartner made his first appearance in England, and we came under the magnetic influence of a leader of men and a poet amongst conductors. Weingartner is great, of that there can be no doubt after his superb performances on the 17th. It only needed the opening Adagio of the "Freischütz" Overture (No. 1 on the programme) to show that no ordinary wielder of the baton stood before us. What are his strong points? He seems, above all, a thoroughly sound and sane musician, bent on reproducing the great master's ipsissima verba, so to speak, and imbuing them with their fullest beauty and nobility. He inflicts no far-fetched "new readings" upon us, nor is he a tempo rubato faddist when dealing with composers to whom rhythm was—as it is still, and has been since the world began—of the very essence of music. His rhythmical accuracy is enchanting; wonderful elasticity, combined with absolute clearness and perfection of detail, distinguish his readings of such strongly rhythmical pieces as Berlioz's Overture "Carnaval Romain" and the Finale to Beethoven's Seventh Symphony. Another of his strong points is beauty of tone. Never have we heard more euphonious combinations of wondrous sounds than he conjured up in the awfully solemn Prelude and Finale to "Parsifal" and the ravishing slow movement of the Symphony. Nor was there a moment throughout the concert when the orchestra sacrificed beauty of tone for mere noisy "effect." In short, performances like those of the "Freischütz" and "Carnaval Romain" Overtures, the Parsifal selection, and the A major Symphony have not been heard in London for many a day; and when it is remembered that the conductor had to deal with an orchestra perfectly strange to him, his triumph (he was recalled three times at the end of the concert) must be considered complete. A word may be added respecting the physical aspect of his conducting, for it is a pleasure to follow Herr Weingartner's movements. They combine the dignity and calm of Dr. Hans Richter with the quicksilvery alertness and exuberance of Mr. Henry J. Wood, and to watch him draw a long slow-time crescendo out of the orchestra and lead up to some great climax is a fine sight and sufficient to explain his influence over his players. His symphonic poem, "King Lear" (Op. 20), is emphatically one of those very complicated works which one would like to hear again before expressing a decided opinion upon its merits. This much may be said, however, that it is a specimen of sensible programme music that can be understood without an "illustrated guide," in which every theme is labelled and everything means something. An acquaintance with Shakespeare's tragedy, such as may be assumed in the case of an audience at a high-class concert, is all that is required to understand and appreciate the "story" of Herr Weingartner's poem. The music is the work of a gifted composer and a serious thinker. It has strength, solidity, directness, and sincerity to recommend it; and if the melodic invention seems none too spontaneous, if even the pathetic figure of Cordelia fails to inspire a strain of genuine fresh and haunting beauty, there is yet so much to admire in the way of ingenious polyphony and metamorphoses of themes, excellent orchestration, sonorous and sombre rather than brilliant, and last but not least there are moments of such deep impressiveness and almost tragic intensity, that we shall be glad to hear the work again. It was received with a warmth that should have rejoiced the heart of Herr Weingartner.

LAMOUREUX CONCERTS.

THE concert conducted by M. Lamoureux, on the 4th ult., at the Queen's Hall, scarcely calls for criticism. The chief feature was a performance of Tschaïkowsky's Sixth Symphony in B minor, and the French conductor's reading of the work was commented upon at length in THE MUSICAL TIMES for April and May of this year. There is nothing more to add to what has been said concerning his marvellously finished interpretations of Saint-Saëns's symphonic poem "Le Roûet d'Omphale" and the "Siegfried Idyll," which were the other notable features of the programme. But Mr. Leonard Borwick's fine rendering of the solo part of Mozart's Concerto in A (B. and H., No. 23) for pianoforte and orchestra calls for record and emphatic praise. The classic purity of the opening Allegro, the gently pathetic grace of the Andante, and the innocent and sprightly prattle of the final Presto were expressed to perfection by our English pianist, and this, combined with the keen sympathy and delicacy with which the orchestral portions were played, went to make up a performance that will long be remembered by all appreciative listeners.

Between the leaves of the programme book was inserted a copy of a letter from M. Lamoureux to Mr. Newman expressing a desire to give his services at an extra concert as a mark of appreciation of Mr. Newman's enterprise. This concert took place on the 21st ult. and was attended by a crowded audience. It was opened with the Overture to Mozart's "Magic Flute" and comprised Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony and several familiar excerpts from Wagner. Saving for an occasional lack of robustness and breadth in the phrasing, the selection was superbly rendered, and emphatically proved the success of Mr. Newman's engagement of M. Lamoureux to conduct an English orchestra. It is pleasant to know that these concerts will be resumed next November.

MR. ROBERT NEWMAN'S BENEFIT CONCERT.

WHEN the Queen's Hall Symphony Orchestra, through their leader, Mr. Arthur W. Payne, signified their desire to offer Mr. Newman a benefit concert, it was a foregone conclusion that the programme would consist mainly of Wagner selections. They and their conductor wished their chief a "bumper" house—and there is nothing like your Wagner just now for drawing crowds to a concert-room, unless, indeed, it be Tschaïkowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony. As a matter of fact, the programme was wholly (and chronologically) Wagnerian, and it did attract a full house on April 30. Mr. Wood repeated his oft-recorded triumphs with his glowing and brilliant performances of the overtures and preludes to "Rienzi," "The Flying Dutchman," "Tannhäuser," "Tristan," "Die Meistersinger," and "Parsifal," those six great masterpieces—a whole programme in themselves—whose unparalleled popularity is the best proof of Wagner's wisdom in prefacing his operatic works with properly developed movements. They have, perhaps, done more for Wagner than all the articles and pamphlets and books that have ever been written for and against him and his art. Like those earlier works of genius, the overtures of Mozart, Beethoven, Weber, and Mendelssohn, they have, moreover, proved a perfect God-send to concert-givers. This being the case, and seeing that orchestral concerts are scarcely complete without one or two overtures, it seems passing strange that so useful and satisfactory a form of art is so little and, on the whole, so unsuccessfully cultivated in these days. When and where will the composer arise who shall continue the chain of really great overtures which, beginning with Gluck's "Iphigenia," seems almost to have come to an end with "Parsifal"? Mr. Wood and his orchestra were at their best in the "Flying Dutchman" and "Meistersinger" overtures, and the Trauermarsch from "Götterdämmerung"; the last-named especially was played with magnificent breadth and a noble pathos and dignity that were intensely moving. The orchestral arrangement (violin solo, Mr. Payne) of the song "Träume" (the melody of which, by the way, is not to be found in the love music in "Tristan," as the analyst stated) and "Elizabeth's Greeting" completed the programme. Miss Ella Russell sang this beautiful air with infectious and appropriate enthusiasm and twice over, first in English and then in German. The latter suited both her voice and the music much better. We were delighted to notice that in both performances the whole of the orchestral introduction was played, instead of merely a few bars. Other singers, please copy!

CRYSTAL PALACE CONCERTS.

THE programme of the concert of April 23—St. George's Day—was largely devoted to vocal and choral music, the pièce de résistance being Mendelssohn's "Lobgesang," which had not been heard at Sydenham for nearly eight years. An excellent performance was secured, under the direction of Mr. Manns, the choir having previously distinguished itself in Bishop's "Sleep, gentle lady," which was encored and repeated. Madame Ada Patterson sang with good effect Costa's "I will extol Thee"; Madame Ella Russell gave "The night is calm and cloudless," from the "Golden Legend," to the great satisfaction of the audience, and Mr. Henry Piercy sang "Come, Margarita, come."

The great feature of the concert on April 30 was Mr. Leonard Borwick's admirable rendering of the solo in Schumann's Pianoforte Concerto; but a very favourable impression was made by the new symphonic prologue to Chaucer's "Canterbury Tales" from the pen of Mr. W. H. Bell, who was twice summoned to bow his acknowledgments at the close of his work. Mr. Manns directed a fine performance of Beethoven's Symphony in B flat (No. 4), and the programme, which opened with Dvorák's brilliant "Carnival" Overture, included vocal pieces from Madame Marian McKenzie and Mr. Arthur Walenn.

Mr. Manns's annual benefit concert took place on the afternoon of the 7th ult., when a number of distinguished artists contributed to the success of the entertainment. Thus Madame Bloomfield-Zeisler, who made her début at Sydenham, played Saint-Saëns's Concerto in C minor with all the facility and individuality which render her perhaps the most interesting of all living Amazons of the keyboard. Herr Kruse greatly distinguished himself by his broad and impressive rendering of Max Bruch's G minor violin concerto, while Miss Ella Russell took part with the choir in Mendelssohn's "Loreley" Finale. Mr. Lloyd also sang, and Mr. Manns, who was most enthusiastically received, conducted throughout with his habitual animation and skill.

THE FEIS CEOIL AT BELFAST.

(BY OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.)

WHAT is a Feis Ceoil? The question is a very natural one to be put by the uninitiated. The term consists of two Irish words signifying a "feast of music," or a musical festival. Before proceeding to pronounce an opinion upon the Feis Ceoil, I will endeavour to show how its title should be pronounced. "Faysh Keole" is, I venture to think, a very fair approximation in plain English. It is said that the Feis Ceoil can trace its origin back to pre-historic times. The word Feis is associated with the ancient Gathering of Tara, hence Thomas Moore's well known lines—

> The harp that once through Tara's halls
> The soul of music shed.

The modern Feis Ceoil, according to official information, "aims at the cultivation of Irish music and its presentation to the public in a becoming manner. It also includes amongst its objects the advancement of musical education and activity in Ireland generally, so as to regain for the country, if possible, its old eminence among musical nations." Excellent objects which cannot be gainsaid. The Feis Ceoil Association, having its central office at 19, Lincoln Place, Dublin, was formed only two years ago. The first meeting, held in Dublin last year, was attended with encouraging success. It was quite in the natural order of things that the second Feis Ceoil should take place at Belfast. The commercial importance of the capital of Ulster would be sufficient justification for its selection as the place of meeting. But there was a peculiar fitness in the choice of Belfast, inasmuch as a little more than a hundred years ago a memorable gathering of Irish native harpers was held there which resulted in the important collection of Irish folk-songs associated with the name of Edward Bunting. The promoters of that Feis Ceoil of harpers—held July 11-13, 1792—engaged Bunting, then a youthful musician of nineteen, to note down the native airs played by those old Irishmen, the folk-melodies which in all probability would otherwise have become extinct, and therefore irrecoverable. It speaks well for the foresight of those Belfast enthusiasts of 1792 that Bunting's excellent collection has formed the basis of all subsequent compilations, including that associated with the more familiar name of Thomas Moore.

The modern Feis Ceoil takes the form of a series of musical competitions and concerts somewhat after the model of the Welsh Eisteddfod. But whereas at the Eisteddfod the competitions may range from the trimming of a Welsh hat to the singing of a double chorus by Handel, the Feis Ceoil contests are exclusively musical, as the festival held at Belfast from Monday, the 2nd, to Saturday, the 7th ult., abundantly proved.

The opening day (Monday) was devoted to the preliminary competitions and a conversazione given by the Lord Mayor (Alderman Henderson) and the Lady Mayoress of Belfast, in the Exhibition Hall, Botanic Gardens. The guests included delegates from various parts of Ireland, from the Highlands of Scotland, and from Wales. The meetings of the Feis Ceoil were held in the Ulster Hall. This fine building, with its numerous smaller halls, proved to be fully adequate to the requirements of the festival. The whole of Tuesday was occupied with the vocal solos, pianoforte, and junior violin competitions. Some remarkably fine playing was heard in the pianoforte contest, one of the test pieces, Weber's noble Sonata in A flat, being played, and admirably played, from memory, by four of the lady competitors. The first concert, which took place in the evening, was devoted entirely to Irish music, the lady members of the chorus wearing sashes of the national colour. This home-made concert was not without interest, even to a jaded Londoner. The chief novelty was a performance on the Irish pipes by a genuine Paddy, who hailed from Gweedore, Donegal. This gentleman, Mr. Turlough Sweeney, played an Irish reel in a manner which proved the truth of the words (admirably set to music by Mrs. Needham and sung during the evening)—

> And off we'll go, so merrily O,
> With heel and toe,
> And toe and heel.
> O where is the dance from here to France,
> Can our hearts entrance like an Irish reel.

Mr. Denis O'Sullivan, an Irish vocalist well known in London, infused genuine humour into his singing of such typical Irish songs as "Widow Machree" and "The low-backed car." Space does not allow me to enlarge upon the various native airs sung at this initial concert, which, if rather too long, was decidedly enjoyable.

"Organ and Harmonium" headed the agenda paper of Wednesday. The test piece for the king of instruments was Hesse's Toccata in A flat, which was very creditably executed by more than one performer. In the afternoon, "string quartet, senior violin, and boys' solo singing" was "the bill of fare." The test piece in the first-named was Haydn's delightful Quartet in G (Op. 76, No. 1), with its charming slow movement. The prize-winners (Mr. George Brett's quartet) played in so refined and highly artistic a manner as to evoke surprise from the adjudicator that the performers were all amateurs. The solo violin competition also reached a high standard, and it was abundantly evident that the capacities of the various players were by no means limited to a scraping acquaintance with their instruments. The chief feature of the concert in the evening was a performance of Sullivan's "Golden Legend," with full orchestra and chorus, the principals being such well known artists as Madame Medora Henson, Miss Lucie Johnstone, Mr. Lloyd Chandos, and Mr. Denis O'Sullivan. If the work did not receive an ideal rendering, there were many points which reflected great credit upon the conductor, Dr. F. Koeller. The "Golden Legend" was preceded by performances of the prize anthem, "Remember now thy Creator," composed by the late G. F. Horan, and the prize overture, "Song of the Naiades," a melodious work by Mr. Brendon J. Rogers.

The contests arranged for Thursday proved to be disappointing in the collapse of the school competitions. The executive had arranged no less than three classes for "School Choirs or School Singing Classes." It will scarcely be credited that there was only one entry for all three classes, and that one was a school choir that came all the way from Dublin. The result is highly discreditable to the elementary schools that must abound in a great city like Belfast. The little people from North Strand School, Dublin—who entered a class in a higher grade than was necessary—acquitted themselves admirably, and their able teacher, Mr. Nesbitt, deserves the highest commendation for his skilful training of the children. The manner in which they sang (in two parts) the sight test was as remarkable as the facility with which they wrote down the ear test. In the latter instance they caused much amusement by correcting a mistake made by one of the adjudicators when he repeated the playing of the test on the pianoforte. The children used the tonic sol-fa notation. The evening concert commenced with a performance of the Feis Ceoil prize cantata, a setting of Thomas Campbell's "Reullura," composed by Dr. F. Koeller, conductor of the Belfast Philharmonic Society. It is impossible to express an opinion upon this ambitious work, owing to its inadequate performance. It abounds in passages that strike the ear as decidedly ungrateful on a first hearing, and the work is so heavily scored that the voices were simply overpowered by the blasts of the brass, more or less in tune. Mozart's "Zauberflöte" Overture and Beethoven's C minor Symphony, which formed the second part of the concert, came, therefore, as refreshing dew on the parched earth.

Friday witnessed the larger choral competitions, in which the Belfast people showed a keener interest than in the contests on the previous days. The morning was devoted to the smaller choral societies—i.e., those numbering not less than twenty or more than fifty voices. The test pieces included "In going to my lonely bed," by Richard Edwards, one of the most delightful specimens of unaccompanied part-music. The winners were the Dublin Glee Singers, conducted by Mr. Joseph Seymour (a prize-winner in the composition competitions), and their excellent singing, the result of skilful training, obtained for them the high number of ninety-five marks out of a possible 100. Three choirs (thirty-five to fifty voices) competed for the great prize of £50 and a miniature gold harp to the conductor. The principal test piece, Meyerbeer's 91st Psalm, was not very happily chosen. In selecting the music, not only should the choirs be considered as to what will be interesting to them, but also the audience for the same reason. The prize was gained by the Belfast Madrigal Society, conducted by Dr. Koeller. Only two choirs entered for the male-voice competition. The singing of the prize-winners—The Belfast Select Choir, conducted by Dr. Price—was of the most refined nature, and drew from the judges the high tribute that "the singing of the choir was the most beautiful they had ever heard." A prize-winners' concert in the evening attracted a large and enthusiastic audience. Saturday's doings (for which I was unable to remain) ranged from "the recording of unpublished Irish airs in the phonograph" to a "country fiddlers'" competition. The first prize in the Brass and Reed Band competition was won by the Cork Working Men's Band, and in the Brass Bands, the Sirocco Brass Band (Belfast) and Boys' Brigade Band (Lurgan) were equal.

The general impressions produced upon me by the Feis Ceoil were distinctly favourable. The scheme being only in its infancy must not be judged by a standard that would be applicable to an institution of matured growth. Much will depend upon its general management if it is to take root, as I sincerely hope it will, in the Emerald Isle. The promoters have acted wisely in making instrumental music a strong feature. The remarkably high standard attained by the various performers on instruments during the Belfast meeting was a most gratifying surprise in the proceedings. The choral music was also excellent; the solo singing not so good. I have already referred to the school singing, or rather the absence of it. The Feis Ceoil movement in Erin's Isle deserves the sympathy of all who are interested in the spread of the divine art of music.

The prize list is of such great length that it is impossible to give the names of all the successful competitors in the various contests. The following, however, are the prize-winners in the composers' competitions:—Cantata, F. Koeller (Belfast); overture, Brendon Rogers (Dublin); anthem, G. F. Horan, since deceased (Dublin); original part-song and pianoforte solo, Leopold Dix (Dublin); original song, Mrs. Needham (London); original song (Irish words), J. C. Culwick (Dublin); violin and pianoforte duet, F. R. McClintock (London); arrangement of Irish air as a part-song, Joseph Seymour (Dublin).

The adjudicator in the composition competitions was Sir Walter Parratt, Master of the Queen's music. Dr. Roland Rogers acted as adjudicator, in co-operation with several leading Irish musicians, in the practical subjects.

The courtesy of Miss Edith Oldham (one of the first scholars of the Royal College of Music) and her unwearying labours as honorary secretary of the Feis Ceoil, call for full recognition. In the same connection must be mentioned the name of Mr. Charles H. Brett, the honorary treasurer of the Belfast Committee, in whom was typified the best traditions of Irish hospitality.

THE BRIDLINGTON MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

THE fifth of the annual festivals instituted at Bridlington by means of the zeal, ability, and, it may be added, not a little of the hard cash of Mr. A. W. M. Bosville, the squire of a neighbouring village, took place on April 21. The advance shown in both programme and performances was very satisfactory, and proved what latent possibilities there are in even the most unpromising districts. "Yorkshire choruses" are famous, but Yorkshire is a large county and the rich and sonorous voices of the West Riding have no counterpart East of the City of York. Ten years ago it would have been rash to prophesy a creditable performance of so exacting a work as Dvorák's "Stabat Mater," given as it was by an exclusively local chorus and a band of none save Yorkshire players. The band was indeed exceptionally capable, and the dismal forebodings roused by the prospect of Tschaïkowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony performed by a scratch provincial band after a single rehearsal, and under an amateur conductor, were falsified by a performance which, if not flawless, was characterized by extraordinary spirit, and, it may be added, extraordinary rapidity; for the time it occupied is probably one of the shortest on record. In the "Stabat Mater," which was more familiar to the players, for it has often been heard in Yorkshire of late, the standard attained by the orchestra was higher, and deserved a more positive epithet than "creditable." The chorus-singing was, save for one premature lead, very accurate, and the pitch was well kept. Over-anxiety was no doubt the reason why the subtle nuances with which Dvorák's score bristles were not always observed, and the difficulty of securing a pianissimo is felt with more experienced singers than those of Bridlington.

There were two concerts, the afternoon programme consisting of the two works already named, while the evening fare was of a more miscellaneous description. It included the "Meistersinger" Overture, Saint-Saëns's very attractive setting of Victor Hugo's ballad "La Fiancée du Timballier" for soprano solo (Mrs. Bosville) and orchestra, Weber's Concertstück, played by Miss Gertrude Wortley, a promising young pianist who already possesses brilliant executive powers, and Sir Frederick Bridge's graphic "Inchcape Rock." Then came that popular piece of pantomimic art, the "Danse Macabre" of Saint-Saëns, and, by way of the strongest possible contrast, the concert ended with Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise." The chorus had here a much easier task, and sang with more ease and freedom than in the afternoon, the performance of the "Inchcape Rock" being especially spirited. The principal soprano was Miss Agnes Nicholls, who fully maintained the advance that has been recently noticeable in her singing. Mrs. Bosville, in addition to the solo in Saint-Saëns's ballad, which was in parts rather low for her voice, though she sang it very expressively, took the second soprano part in the "Hymn of Praise." The contralto was Mrs. Burrell, who sang the "Inflammatus" in Dvorák's work with thoroughly artistic feeling and expression. The tenor was Mr. Richard Streatfeild, whose method wanted reticence, especially in the "Stabat Mater," and Mr. Francis Harford sang the bass solos in that work most artistically. Mr. Bosville was a most zealous and painstaking conductor and succeeded in saving some difficult situations. In his tempi he was by no means a blind follower of tradition, and while it was for the most part easy to perceive reason in his readings, there was perhaps rather too constant an inclination to drag the time, with the exception, already noticed, of the "Pathetic" Symphony. At the same time, it would be unjust, as well as ungracious, not to acknowledge the wonders he has accomplished in engineering so difficult an undertaking with so remarkable a measure of success.

THE HANDEL SOCIETY.

SPECIAL interest was attached to the concert given by the Handel Society on the 18th ult., at the Queen's Hall, owing to the performance, in its entirety, of Handel's "Nisi Dominus" ("Except the Lord keep the house"), Psalm cxxvii. This work was reviewed at length in THE MUSICAL TIMES for May last, when Mr. T. W. Bourne's proofs of the unattached "Gloria Patri" being the missing conclusion of the "Nisi Dominus" were dwelt upon and accepted as conclusive. Messrs. Novello's recently issued complete edition was used on this occasion, and the excellence of Mr. T. W. Bourne's editing made manifest, especially in the second and fifth numbers, the whole of the accompaniment of the former and the greater part of that of the latter having had to be supplied by Mr. Bourne. The fifth number and the third—the latter a short but dignified and expressive alto air—are the two best solos in the work, and are very effective. The opening chorus, with its passages for solo voices, is a very interesting movement, and the solo "Sicut sagittæ" ("Like as the arrow") is of a kind to delight the heart of a "sturdy bass." Any doubts that might linger concerning the "Gloria Patri" being the original Finale is dismissed when it is heard in connection with the preceding numbers, it being so thoroughly in keeping with what has gone before. The Psalm was preceded by Bach's First Orchestral Suite in C, chiefly distinctive by the dignity of its overture, and followed by Saint-Saëns's familiar Introduction and Rondo Capriccioso for violin and orchestra, the solo part of which was played in a notably expressive and brilliant manner by Miss Lilian Wright. This closed the first part of the evening, which was conducted by Mr. J. S. Liddle. Subsequently Sir Hubert Parry took up the baton and conducted his "L'Allegro ed il Pensieroso." This beautiful work is always welcome, and the Handel Society has never sung better than in its interpretation of the masterlike composition. The solo portions were well sung by Miss Margaret Barter and Mr. Cyril Streatfeild, and the last-named, together with Miss Sybil Bristowe and Mr. R. A. Streatfeild, were the soloists in "Nisi Dominus."

WALENN CHAMBER CONCERTS.

THE first performance in London of a MS. Trio in D minor for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, by Farquharson Walenn, the first of the remarkably gifted family to gain distinction in the musical profession, was the chief feature of the concert given on April 26, at the Queen's (Small) Hall, by Messrs. Walenn. The composer of this trio, it may be mentioned, was a fellow student with Mr. Eugène d'Albert at the National Training, now the Royal College of Music, where he gained the Novello Scholarship. While yet in his teens he was appointed organist to St. Alban's, Holborn, but a career of exceptional promise was closed by his death, in 1884, in his twenty-fourth year. The trio is incomplete and the work stops at the end of the third movement, which, by a coincidence, is headed Andantino patetico. The music is singularly clear in form and development, and its themes possess considerable freshness; the second of the opening movement is most charming, and in its entirety the trio has a peculiar optimistic expression, as of young eyes looking out on the world with childlike trust and confidence. It was carefully interpreted by Miss Dora Bright, Mr. Gerald and Mr. Herbert Walenn, and met with the appreciation it well deserved. Miss Bright gave the first performance of a Melody in D flat, by Mr. Edward German, a trifling but graceful pianoforte piece; and several other instrumental solos, effectively played by the concert-givers, and some songs contributed by Miss Esther Palliser and Madame Belle Cole completed the programme.

MR. G. A. CLINTON'S CHAMBER CONCERTS.

THE virtue of perseverance is an estimable quality nowhere more appreciated than in England, and Mr. Clinton well deserves the reward that the copy books tell us always comes, and which seems at length to have arrived, judging by the larger attendances at his concerts. On April 25 he presented an excellent programme, prominent features of which were Brahms's romantic Trio in E flat (Op. 40) for pianoforte, violin, and horn; Mr. R. H. Walthew's clever Trio in C minor for pianoforte, violin, and clarinet; and Spohr's Octet in E (Op. 32) for violin, two violas, clarinet, two horns, violoncello, and double-bass, the instrumentalists engaged being Miss Mathilde Verne, Miss Jessie Grimson, and Messrs. Walthew, Hobday, Tomlinson, Clinton, Borsdorf, Busby, Parker, and Winterbottom. Several new songs were sung by Mr. Arthur Walenn, notably "The lament of Isis," by Mr. Granville Bantock, which possesses considerable dramatic intensity, and "The song of love and death," an effective composition with clarinet obbligato by R. H. Walthew.

At the concert on the 9th ult. a very favourable impression was made by a Quintet in G minor for pianoforte, flute, clarinet, horn, and bassoon, by Mr. Hurlstone, whose compositions at the students' concerts at the Royal College of Music have frequently drawn forth laudatory comments. The quintet comprises three movements, the middle one, an expressive Andante, being the best, and showing considerable knowledge of what is effective on the instruments employed. A Quintet in D for pianoforte, violin, clarinet, horn, and violoncello, by Z. Fibisch, proved pleasing, and Raff's clever Sinfonietta in F was effectively interpreted. Miss Jessie Grimson's rendering of two of Dvorák's "Slavonic Dances" and the singing of Miss Florence Hughes increased the enjoyment of the evening.

SIGNOR SIMONETTI'S CHAMBER CONCERTS.

FOR his second chamber concert, at the Queen's (Small) Hall, on the 6th ult., Signor Simonetti had arranged a Brahms programme, in which the master's earliest pianoforte quartet (Op. 25) and last piece of chamber music, the Clarinet Quintet, were placed in juxtaposition. It was interesting to hear such ultra-German music interpreted by an enthusiastic Italian artist like Signor Simonetti, and if we cannot altogether approve of his reading of the matchless quintet, but must consider the passion and striving which he infused into its serene strains out of keeping with the very nature of the music of Brahms, we are yet bound to acknowledge the loving care, the high artistic aim which he brought to bear upon the performance, in which he was assisted by Messrs. J. Egerton, Charles Jacoby, Alfred Hobday, and W. E. Whitehouse. The quartet, in which MISS Fanny Davies took the pianoforte part, suited the concert-giver's Southern temperament better, especially, of course, the final Presto in the Hungarian style. He played several of the Hungarian dances with all requisite abandon and swing and excellent technique. Mr. Kennerley Rumford sang the "four serious songs" superbly—like a true artist, in fact. We wish for no finer reading of these most touching and most beautiful masterpieces.

At the last concert, on the 13th ult., C. Goldmark's String Quintet in A minor (Op. 9) was excellently performed. The work deserves more frequent hearings, if only for the sake of the expressive slow movement, in which, on this occasion, the five artists, joined as they were in a perfect ensemble, produced a beauty of tone and a glow of colour which could hardly have been surpassed. Signor Simonetti played Max Bruch's Romance in A con amore, and, as an encore, Schumann's "Gartenmelodie." Madame Frickenhaus and Mr. Whitehouse were heard in solos for the pianoforte and violoncello respectively, and Mr. Gregory Hast delighted the audience by his most refined and expressive singing of songs by Schumann, Brahms, and Goring Thomas. Dvorák's Pianoforte Quintet in A (Op. 81) completed the programme.

PIANOFORTE RECITALS.

MR. VLADIMIR DE PACHMANN, who had been absent from London for six years, received a cordial greeting when he once more stepped on the platform of St. James's Hall for a recital on Saturday afternoon, the 14th ult. As a Chopin player he is as fine—if not finer—than ever, and a group of the Polish master's choicest pieces could not have been more delightfully interpreted as regards sensibility and perfection in touch. He also played Schumann's Sonata in G minor (Op. 22) very well, and various pieces by other composers; but it was in Chopin that he excelled, the selections including the Ballade in A flat (Op. 47), three of the Studies, three of the Preludes, and other pieces. Mr. de Pachmann's hands have lost none of their cunning, and he should return to us again and again, for he will always be welcome.

Miss Agnes Miles, who gave a recital at the Steinway Hall on the 16th ult., is American by birth and a pupil of Moritz Moszkowski. She gave her master's work entitled "Spring" (Op. 57), Chopin's Ballade in G minor, (Op. 23), and various pieces by Bach, Liszt, and other composers with much facility and intelligence as regards execution. Miss Regina de Sales, who continues to improve as a vocalist, rendered admirable assistance in various high-class songs.

Mr. Arthur Friedheim is laudably ambitious as an executant. At his second recital, on the 2nd ult., in St. James's Hall, he played the whole of Chopin's Preludes, twenty-four in number, besides Beethoven's Sonata Appassionata and pieces of great difficulty by Liszt. At the third performance, on the 11th ult., the principal feature was Beethoven's Thirty-three Variations on a waltz by Anton Diabelli, the master's last and, of course, rarely heard pianoforte work; for splendid as the variations are in respect of inspiration, they might prove tedious to many hearers at one sitting. A number of pieces by Chopin and Liszt were included in this programme, and all were rendered with masterly technique and intelligence, though with scarcely sufficient warmth in expression.

Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler gave her second pianoforte recital on Tuesday afternoon, the 10th ult., in St. James's Hall, and the increased attendance afforded evidence that the talented artist is growing in the favour of the London public. Her principal piece was Beethoven's last Sonata in C minor (Op. 111), in which she was more successful in the wonderfully tender Arietta with variations than in the stormy first movement, in which more energy might have been desirable. Some Chopin pieces were rendered with delightful sentiment and delicacy, and Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler's programme included a clever Caprice on airs from Gluck's opera "Alceste," as transcribed by Saint-Saëns, and pieces by Emanuel Bach, Edward Schütt, Schubert, Mendelssohn, and Liszt.

VARIOUS RECITALS.

MADAME KATE COVE and Miss Meredyth Elliott's concert on April 28, at St. James's Hall, proved very enjoyable. Madame Cove's voice has notably increased in volume of late, and her renderings of a good selection of high-class songs were distinguished by much charm of style. A very favourable impression was made by Mr. Arthur Grover, a young baritone of distinct promise, and other executants were Mr. Gregory Hast, Mr. Charles Copland, Miss Alice Elieson, Miss Marie Olson, M. Johannes Wolff, and the Meister Glee Singers.

A noteworthy feature of the vocal and pianoforte recital given on the 13th ult., at the Queen's (Small) Hall, by Mr. Gregory Hast and Mr. Dal Young, was the performance of a song cycle from Browning's poem "In a Gondola," composed by the latter and effectively sung by Madame Emily Squire and Mr. Gregory Hast. Browning's poetry has seldom been set with closer sympathy and suggestiveness of its underlying spirit, and the very essence of the poem seems to animate Mr. Dal Young's refined music.

Madame Blanche Marchesi was assisted at her vocal recital, on April 29, at St. James's Hall, by Mr. Thomas Meux and Herr Johann Kruse. The afternoon was opened in an interesting manner by an excerpt from Gluck's opera "Iphigenia in Tauris," in which the parts of Iphigenia and Orestes were sustained respectively by the concert-giver and Mr. Meux, a choir of ladies representing the priestesses. Madame Marchesi also sang several high-class modern songs with exquisite finish and command of vocal means; but her predilection for Schumann's "Die beiden Grenadiere" is unaccountable, as it is unsuited to her voice, and, above all, is essentially a man's song.

The vocal and pianoforte recital given by Miss Agnes Witting and Madame Elsie Mathis on the 7th ult., at St. James's Hall, was chiefly remarkable for the admirable singing of the former. Miss Witting is the possessor of a soprano voice of pure quality, and her style is singularly earnest and free from all affectation and mannerism. Her selection of songs embraced all schools, and she was as successful in Brahms's lyric "Dort in den Weiden" as in Sir Hubert Parry's expressive song "If thou wouldst ease thine heart" and Mr. W. H. Hadow's graceful "Serenade." Madame Mathis was most happy in her renderings of pieces of a light character, an attractive and unhackneyed selection of which was presented.

The artistic nature of the programme of Mr. H. Whitney Tew's vocal recital, on the 10th ult., at the Queen's (Small) Hall, merits record and commendation. Mr. Tew has yet to acquire greater versatility and command of tone colour, but his singing is distinguished by many estimable qualities. A feature of the afternoon was the rendering of Mr. E. W. Nevin's dainty setting of Mr. Eugene Field's fanciful little poem "Wynken, Blynken, and Nod," by Miss Allen, Miss Phillips, Madame McKenzie, Mr. Buck, and Mr. Tew. Mr. Shakespeare also sang, and some pianoforte pieces were neatly played by Miss Shakespeare.

A vocal recital given by Signorina Elvira Gambogi deserves record by reason of the cleverness of the concert-giver's songs, which formed the greater part of the programme. Signorina Gambogi has selected her text from the best sources, and her settings display a keen apprehension of the most fitting mode of expression, combined with great command of resource and versatility. They were admirably rendered by the concert-giver and the Misses A. Holding, E. Clegg, and A. Stonex, who united form the "Sappho Vocal Quartet," and sang a good selection of four-part music. Miss E. Clegg, who had not sung before in London, has a remarkably rich toned mezzo-soprano voice and is a young vocalist of great promise. Mrs. Helen Trust and Mr. Herbert Thorndike also sang, and instrumental music was contributed by Miss Edith Meadows and Miss Gertrude Collins.

AMATEUR ORCHESTRAL SOCIETIES.

THE special concert given on the 11th ult. by the Westminster Orchestral Society, in aid of the funds of the Westminster Hospital, should certainly add to the reputation of its talented conductor, Mr. Stewart Macpherson. The production of a Mass in May is somewhat prejudicial to the Mass produced; for in the Spring, the poets tell us—and they ought to know—the thoughts lightly turn—to other things; but Mr. Macpherson's music is so genial, and, while often impressive, is so devoid of austerity, that the work proved very acceptable. The key chosen is D, and the style is Italian rather than English in its flowing gracefulness and warmth of expression. The composer, although a staunch Protestant, has adopted the Roman Catholic ritual, and concluded his Mass with the Agnus Dei. The most important numbers, the Gloria and Credo, have been elaborated with much care and skill. The former contains a melodious solo and several expressive passages for a soprano voice, and ends in fugal fashion with much vigour. The Credo also includes some imposing sections, and a commendable feature in this, as also in the Gloria, is the effective support of the voice parts by the orchestral portion. The Sanctus is unaccompanied, and forms an excellent contrast to the vigorous ending of the preceding number. The solo part was effectively sung by Madame Ruth Lamb, and the choruses were rendered with good intention by the Streatham and Reigate Choral Societies, both of which are conducted by Mr. Macpherson. Another interesting event was the first performance in England of a Suite in D, consisting of three movements for violin and pianoforte, by Madame C. de Champmoynat, whose writings, although little known here, have achieved considerable success on the Continent. The Suite, which was played by M. Louis Duloup and the composer, is light music of a refined and pleasing character, but does not call for further criticism. Herr Georg Liebling gave a brilliant rendering of the solo portion of the conductor's clever Concertstück for pianoforte and orchestra, and the programme also included Cherubini's "Anacreon" Overture, Thomas Wingham's "Choral" Overture, and three numbers from Tschaikowsky's "Casse-Noisette" Suite.

The Strolling Players' concert in the Queen's Hall, on the 5th ult., may be numbered among the most successful given by this Association, conducted so successfully by Mr. Norfolk Megone. The programme included Dvorák's fine but very Beethovenish Symphony in D (known as No. 3), a ballet suite from the opera "Le Chevalier Jean," by Victor Joncières, a Parisian composer, born in 1839, and a prominent critic and a great admirer of Wagner long before the Bayreuth master was understood or appreciated in the French capital; the Overture to "Rienzi," and Litolff's extravagant and gruesome dramatic Overture, "Robespierre." The performances were generally excellent, and vocal and instrumental solos were contributed with effect by Miss Mabel Berrey, Mr. Reginald J. Chalcraft, and Mr. Alexis Sandor.

The Royal Orchestral Society gave its last concert for the present season at the Queen's Hall, on the evening of the 19th ult., and, under Mr. Ernest Ford, the band, which has now finished its twenty-sixth season, gave scant, if any, cause for complaint. Mendelssohn's too rarely heard "Reformation" Symphony and Smetana's picturesque Overture to "Die verkaufte Braut" were the leading works for orchestra alone; but the admirable assistance afforded by Miss Gertrude Peppercorn, one of our more highly promising young female pianists, in Weber's Concertstück, and Madame Alice Gomez, as the vocalist, merits words of praise.

IMPERIAL INSTITUTE.

EVERY institution has its special mission, and from a musical point of view that of the Imperial Institute would seem to be the introduction to London of foreign orchestras and musicians. This may be an unforeseen departure from the objects intended when the costly pile was planned, but to such uses its wooden concert-room and its asphalted back garden have been largely devoted. Last year Herr Eduard Strauss and his merry men occupied the queer little band-stand which seems to have shot out of the shed-like erection that rejoices in the title of "The Pavilion," and on the 9th ult. Signor Leandro Campanari's "concert orchestra from La Scala," Milan, made there its first appearance in London. Signor Campanari's players are well trained, and that their instruments are inferior in tone to those commonly heard in English orchestras is their misfortune rather than their fault. It was a graceful acknowledgment of English art to include Mr. Frederic Cowen's charming "Scandinavian" Symphony in their opening concert, and it was gratifying to think that this music was not strange to them, but that they had played it to admiring audiences in their own sunny country. The interpretation was very praiseworthy, and manifest sympathy was shown with the poetical character of the work. Berlioz's Overture to "Benvenuto Cellini" was rendered with spirit, and the prelude to Reinecke's "King Manfred" was well rendered; but the most successful performances were those of the Intermezzo and Ballet Music from Ponchielli's opera "The Prodigal Son." The same evening the selection included Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony in B minor, and the subsequent programmes have shown good taste and appreciation of all schools of music.

Grosholz (Rochester), Alfred Higson (Ashton-on-Mersey), Jennie Langford (Hull), Jane F. Sherborne (Newcastle-on-Tyne), Louisa E. Willis (Barnstaple).

Pianoforte (Solo Performance).—Beatrice Cerasoli (Bayswater), Alfred R. Cripps (Bayswater), Mary Graham (Notting Hill), Kate Hewins (Grimsby), Marian L. Hillman (Weston-super-Mare), Charles H. Mills (Llangollen), Marjorie P. Richardson (Hampstead), Ethel Wilson (Newcastle-on-Tyne).

Pianoforte (Teaching).—Mary D. Angell (Highgate), Elinor M. Asdell (Sandown, I. of Wight), Helen E. D. Baker (Evesham), Herbert T. Botley (Willesden), Ada F. Brion (St. Margarets), Amy K. Chantler (New Cross), Edith A. Chubb (Hastings), Vincent Dearden (Leicester), Winifred E. Donn (Croydon), Herbert F. Ellingford (Forest Gate), Annie Gard (Dudley), Augusta Gibbons (Brighton), Mary Graham (Notting Hill), Gertrude F. Greenwood (Canterbury), Louise E. Griffin (Clapton), Bessie M. Hadgraft (East Ham), Edith C. Hardy (Gosforth), Tom Harvey (Hampstead), Charlotte F. Hempel (Perth), Marion St. C. Inglis (Hampstead), Winifred M. Ivens (Thame), Florence E. Lackington (Hampstead), A. Janet J. Lawson (Southport), Christabel McCarthy-Jones (Finchley), Ariadne A. Massaouti (Smyrna), Catherine E. May (Dinan), Nellie Motum (Newcastle-on-Tyne), Maude Mullins (Portswood), Mary Noverre (Norwich), Helen G. Nutter (Cambridge), Alice M. Pearce (Chichester), Katherine W. Pickford (Salisbury), Minnie Rodgers (Bourne), Edith Rowland (Guildford), Jane F. Sherborne (Newcastle-on-Tyne), Katharine C. Slade (Parkstone-on-Sea), Mabel S. Smith (Brighton), Ethel B. Tate (Richmond, Yorks.), Sophie C. Von der Heyde (Croydon), Jessie M. M. Walker (Newcastle-on-Tyne).

MISS HOLLAND'S CHOIR.

AN attractive programme was presented by Miss Holland at her concert, on the 23rd ult., at St. Martin's Hall, in aid of the funds of several charities. The most important performance was a selection from Mr. Edward Elgar's dramatic cantata "King Olaf," which, it may be remembered, created so favourable an impression on its production at the North Staffordshire Musical Festival of 1896, an impression that was deepened on its subsequent performance at one of the Crystal Palace Saturday Concerts on April 3 of the following year, and has since been justified by the wide popularity the work has attained. Miss Holland had not provided an orchestra, and consequently the work was deprived of some of its most striking and charming effects; but the freshness, melodiousness, and cleverness of the choral writing are in themselves quite sufficient to hold the attention, and the work was warmly received by a large audience. The parts of Queen Thyri and King Olaf were respectively sustained by Miss Mabel Berrey and Mr. Hirwen Jones, and sundry passages for solo voices were sung by Miss E. H. James, Mr. Holmes, and Mr. Bullen, the last-named also personating Ironbeard. The remainder of the programme consisted of two choral ballads, a "Sturmesmythe" (storm fantasy) by Herr Julius Röntgen, and "Sir Nicholas, a ballad of Marston Moor," by the late Erskine Allon, the latter performed on this occasion for the first time. The text of the former is taken from a poem by N. Lenau, and it has been allied to music which echoes its wild spirit. It was stated that the work had not previously been heard in England. "Sir Nicholas" did not prove so satisfactory. The composer has failed to sufficiently realize the dramatic nature of the story, and much of the music is conventional.

CHORAL MUSIC IN THE YORKSHIRE DALES.

AN ingenious and successful experiment has been made in North Yorkshire to overcome the difficulty that must always be felt in giving choral concerts in sparsely populated districts. The Hon. Lucien Orde-Powlett is the conductor of societies at Middleham, Bedale, and Richmond, and is, as it were, the centre of gravity of a system of co-operation by which each of these towns is enabled to produce far more satisfactory and complete results than it could possibly achieve unaided. A series of three concerts on as many consecutive days was planned: at Middleham on the 26th, at Bedale on the 27th, and at Richmond on the 28th April. Bennett's "May Queen" was given at Middleham, Spohr's "Last Judgment" at the other two centres, followed in each case by a miscellaneous second part. The point of the contrivance was that the chorus at each town was augmented by contingents from the other two, while the bands were, with the exception of four individuals, made up of members of the Swaledale and Wensleydale Societies. Mr. Powlett's plan has been found of great advantage all round. The weaker points in each Society were strengthened by the visitors from the others, and the friendly rivalry that has arisen proves a valuable stimulant. At present, speaking generally, Swaledale is the stronger in strings, Wensleydale in voices. That the Bedale concert was much superior to the other two is chiefly owing to the fact that Mr. Powlett's sway in that Society has been of longer duration than in the others. The practices during the winter months have been conducted by him, with the help of Mr. W. Ellis at Richmond, Mr. Summers at Bedale, and the Rev. W. Kerr-Smith at Middleham, so that the various contingents combine very readily under his baton at the actual performances. The chorus-singing was in each case very creditable, and displayed intelligence, precision, and fair tone. The band, though complete only in the string department, played with zest, and the wind parts were represented by pianoforte and harmonium, though the presence of an amateur oboeist may, it is to be hoped, be regarded as heralding a time when it will no longer be necessary to put up with an inferior, if convenient substitute for the wood-wind. Mr. Powlett is also the chief mover in a scheme for introducing music competitions into this district, and the "Wensleydale Tournament of Song" that was held at Leyburn for the first time on the 28th ult., too late, of course, for notice in this number, will no doubt serve to stimulate the choral music of the district.

MUSICAL ASSOCIATION.

ANCIENT GREEK MUSIC.

THE attention of the members of the Musical Association was again called to Ancient Greek Music at the meeting on the 10th ult., at the Royal College of Organists. The contributor of the paper was Mr. C. F. Abdy Williams, who went into the subject with all the zeal and ardour of an enthusiast, and after giving a list of authorities from whence we derive our knowledge of the art as practised by the ancient Greeks, described the building up and construction of the great scale and the peculiarities of the modes derived from it. He also showed the Greek method of musical notation both for voices and instruments as described by Alypius 200 B.C., and dealt with the fragments of Greek melody which have been preserved. Some interesting information was given concerning the performances of Greek plays at Bradfield College, where

Mr. Williams is music master, and there were exhibited one of the lyres made for these representations, and an aulos, the latter made by Mr. Blaikley. After so much painstaking explanation it must have been rather trying to the lecturer to be asked at the close by the Rev. O. F. Vignoles what satisfactory proofs we had that our deductions were correct, and to have the doubt expressed as to whether we did not "read-in" our own ideas into this ancient music. This called forth fresh explanations, and an account of Egyptian music from Mr. T. L. Southgate. The chairman, Dr. C. D. Maclean, also contributed some thoughtful remarks, and dwelt upon the pure character of Greek art.

GRESHAM LECTURES.

CHOPIN'S SONGS.

SIR FREDERICK BRIDGE began his Easter term series of Gresham music lectures on the 16th ult., at the City of London School. The subject of the first discourse was Chopin's set of seventeen songs, which were sung by Miss Helen Jaxon, Mr. E. Branscombe, and Mr. Daniel Price. At the outset of his remarks the lecturer gave the true date of Chopin's birth as recently established by the discovery of his baptismal certificate, which proves that the composer was born on February 22, 1810, and was baptised on the following April 23, at the village church of Brochow, in which his parents, Nicholas Chopin (the certificate reads Nicolai Choppen) and Justina de Kryzanowsa, had been married on June 28, 1806. Chopin seemed to have inherited his peculiar sensitiveness and Slavonic temperament from his mother, who was of pure Polish family. When barely nine he improvised in public, and ten years later he was a virtuoso, and gave recitals in Vienna, Munich, and Paris, ultimately making the last-named city his home and joining in the new romantic school of music, of which Berlioz was the most daring representative. Chopin was peculiarly attached to his family and very fond of his sister Louisa, who frequently came to see him and spent the last three months of his life with him. He had a great dislike to write to any but members of his own family, and had been known to traverse Paris from end to end to decline an invitation rather than write a letter. He came to London in 1848 and was greatly fêted. He returned to Paris, utterly worn out, to find his friend and physician, Dr. Molin, dead, and died himself on October 17, 1849. He specially requested that Mozart's Requiem should be sung at his funeral, and the Funeral March from the Sonata in B flat minor (Op. 35) was played as the Introit, this being the first time that it was played by an orchestra as arranged by Reber. The seventeen songs were composed between 1824 and 1844. Little was said about them by his biographers. They were unequal in merit, and some approached the commonplace. The melodies were national in character, but the interludes formed the most characteristic features.

The second lecture was a continuation of the interesting discourses upon organ music, the life and works of Thomas Adams being considered on this occasion. This composer, born September 5, 1785, began the study of music at the age of eleven, under Dr. Busby, and at seventeen was appointed organist of Carlisle Chapel, Lambeth. He possessed a remarkable gift for extemporising, and was one of the best English organists. In his organ compositions he showed himself an ingenious contrapuntist, and his writings, though difficult to execute, were very effective and never dull. The Fugue in C, on a subject from Méhul's opera "Joseph," was expressly written for No. 35 of Novello's "Select Organ Pieces." This and several other works were effectively rendered by Mr. Arthur Bly, organist of Hammersmith Parish Church.

The third lecture dealt with "The development of oratorio," and the illustrations comprised selections from the Passion Music of Reinhard Kaiser, the Chorus of Disciples from the Passion music of Handel, and selections from that composer's oratorio "Esther," the soloists being Miss Helen Jaxon, and Messrs. Oakley, Fell, and Ackerman.

The series was concluded on the 20th ult., when the collection of Elizabethan madrigals known as "The Triumphs of Oriana" formed the subject. Several of these were sung by members of the choir of Westminster Abbey, and also a setting of the text of one of them by Dr. Armes, which, under the title of "Victoria," gained last year's prize of the Madrigal Society.

TONIC SOL-FA COLLEGE.

SIR JOHN HUTTON, chairman of the London County Council, presided at the annual meeting held at Queen's Hall, on the 23rd ult. There was a large and enthusiastic audience, which warmly applauded the fine singing of the South London Choral Association, conducted by Mr. L. C. Venables, and the South London Temperance Choir, conducted by Mr. W. S. Betts. The united choirs opened with Handel's "The many rend the skies" and closed with the "Hallelujah" chorus, in which most of the audience joined. They also, with the aid of Miss Bessie Spells, gave Mendelssohn's "Hear my Prayer." Among the pieces sung by the choirs individually we would note "The challenge of Thor," by Elgar; "Sweetly through the night," by H. R. Shelley; a new choral ode, "The unseen choir," by E. A. Dicks; and "The Angels Whisper," by Dr. Coward. The performances of the choir of children from Hazelrigge Road Board School were most satisfactory, and are fully described in the School Music Review for this month. Addresses were given by the Rev. J. Cullen, Mr. J. T. Macnamara, M.L.S.B., and Mr. J. S. Curwen, the President of the College. Silver commemorative medals, bearing on the obverse a profile of the late John Curwen and on the reverse a suitable inscription, were handed by Lady Hutton to the veteran secretary of the college, Mr. Robert Griffiths, and to thirteen other pioneers of the tonic sol-fa movement. The satisfactory report stated that 23,672 tonic sol-fa certificates were granted during the past year.

THE ANGLO-RUSSIAN LITERARY SOCIETY.

RUSSIAN MUSIC AND SONG.

COLONEL JOHN DAVIS read an interesting paper on "Russian Music and Song" before the members of the Anglo-Russian Literary Society, on the 3rd ult., at the Imperial Institute. The paper was contributed by Madame Anna L. K. Bezant, a teacher of singing of repute resident at St. Petersburg. The writer opened her paper with a brief comparison of the music of European countries, and said in none of them was the love of song more deeply rooted than in Russia. There was a great difference between the music of "Little" Russia and that of "Great" Russia. In the South-East provinces instrumental accompaniments had always been usual, and the shape of some of the instruments suggest that these provinces had grown up under Asiatic influence. The bandoora, a popular instrument, was the exact counterpart of the ancient Persian tanboor. Seroff, however, maintained that the predominance of the minor mode and other characteristics in the folk-songs indicated a Polish origin. The prevalence of the minor key never became monotonous. Every song had its distinctive point and meaning, and the words embraced references to almost every phase of village life. The marriage ceremony in particular had a special series of songs, from the "maiden's weeping" when she accepted her lover to the banging of hands on the table, the latter an important custom at weddings in the Siberian provinces. The songs of "Little" Russia were the most attractive, and many of them possessed great melodic beauty. The sacred music was based on the ancient Greek modes and did not possess the same characteristics as the secular songs. Russian composers had a genius for making melody, and besides those who had recently acquired European fame, there were many others whose works deserved to be widely known.

MUSICAL COMPETITIONS.

KENDAL.

FOR some years past the plan of encouraging the practice of good music in rural districts, begun by Miss Wakefield at Kendal, has been spreading in other districts.

Cumberland, two centres in Yorkshire, Worcestershire, Cheshire, West Norfolk, and Lancashire are this year following suit, with results that, generally speaking, promise well for the home music of these districts.

The Kendal Festival, on April 19 to 21, was the thirteenth of these meetings, which were founded in 1885, and have been held annually since then, with the omission of one year. On this occasion there were twenty-five competitions, vocal and instrumental, and, as usual, the introduction of sight-reading tests afforded a wholesome guarantee against the cramming of competitors. The first day was given up to the children, of whose singing this general remark may be made: it showed an effort after refinement and truth of expression that spoke eloquently of the influence of these festivals upon teachers and taught. After the competitions the children united in singing Tours's tuneful cantata "The Home of Titania," with a relish that was amusing, while the solo parts were taken by children with really remarkable success. A new feature in this concert was the appearance of some of the younger students at the Manchester College of Music, whose playing of solos and chamber music demonstrated the excellence of the teaching at that Institution; while the violin playing of a lad named Catterall was of an exceptionally high order. His future career will be watched with interest.

On the second day adult solo vocalists and instrumentalists were taken. In the latter class there were some new departures, the competitions including violin solos, pianoforte trios, string quartets, and "village orchestras"—by which is meant a collection of every available instrument in a village. Two movements from Handel's "Occasional" Overture formed the test piece for this last competition, and were really most creditably played by the two genuine village bands that entered for the prize.

The number of competitors has grown to such an extent that now it is possible to divide the choralists into two distinct choirs, and to allot to each one of the two concerts with which the proceedings end. For the former a choral work no less exacting than Mr. Somervell's "Ode to the Sea" was chosen, and was satisfactorily performed under Miss Wakefield's conductorship, with Mrs. Hutchinson as soloist. Mr. Plunket Greene and Mr. J. Robertson also sang, and during the interval Lady Mabel Howard distributed the prizes won during the first two days of the festival.

The third day, with its choir competitions, was the most important and most keenly contested of any of the three. The village choral competition has always been an event of especial significance, and has doubtless done much for the choral singing of Westmoreland. Its drawback has, however, been the natural one that a few of the stronger or more populous centres have monopolised the rewards, so this year there were three sections arranged, to which the competitors were allotted according to their respective powers, a system of handicapping well contrived to give smaller villages a chance. The value of the sight reading test was shown by the important differences it made in the aggregate of marks awarded to each competitor. Thus, in the "C" section, the two choirs which were last in the test piece won the highest possible in sight reading, so that in the result they obtained the highest totals and the first and second prizes. The blue ribbon of the festival is the madrigal competition, which, as usual, produced some excellent singing. The Kendal Parish Church Choir won the first prize with fifty-eight marks out of a possible sixty, while the fact that the second obtained fifty-five and the third fifty-three shows how high was the standard reached. In the evening the "Hymn of Praise" was sung and Lady Lonsdale gave away the prizes. Mr. F. Cunningham Woods acted as judge and made his decisions the more valuable by the advice with which he accompanied them, while their fairness was very generally admitted.

York.

Inspired by the extraordinary results obtained at Kendal, some ladies and gentlemen in York—notably, Miss Mary Egerton, a very enthusiastic amateur—determined to introduce the competition system to their own district. To help them in rousing enthusiasm for their cause they secured the active sympathy of Miss Wakefield, who not only gave them the benefit of her experience, but addressed a meeting held at the Mansion House on the virtues of competition. The result was that proceedings were opened, on April 25 and 26, with a thoroughly complete and well organised scheme, which was taken up with more enthusiasm than might have been expected for an initial effort. All the classes were limited to a certain radius, and many to the smaller villages of the district, so that the common pot-hunter, who is so detrimental to the purposes of these competitions, was practically excluded. Mr. P. V. Sharman was judge of the instrumental classes, which included violin soloists, both senior and junior, as well as string quartets, and produced some remarkably good results.

The choral competitions were adjudicated upon by Dr. McNaught, whose judgments were as luminous as ever, while the result of his criticisms should be felt in next year's "Yorkshire Choral Competitions." There were more entries in the junior classes than in the adult, but on the whole the results were very encouraging, more so, perhaps, than the promoters expected for a first attempt. The one fault which Dr. McNaught felt in the choral singing generally was an absence of a sufficiently keen sense of rhythm, but this will doubtless come in due time. It is just one of the chief purposes of these competitions to enable choirs to see themselves as others see them. During the concert with which the proceedings ended, the Lady Mayoress gave away the prizes, and Miss Wakefield, in addition to singing several solos, gave an address in which encouragement was mingled with warnings in wholesome proportions.

Morecambe.

The annual music competitions held at Morecambe are an event much looked forward to by numerous choral bodies in the North-West of England. Some of the best small choirs in the Yorkshire and Lancashire district have won laurels at this attractive watering-place. On this occasion the competitions were spread over two days. There were classes for string quartets, vocal quartets, and choirs of varied constitution. Mr. Eaton Faning was the sole adjudicator. In the highest choral section, in which the standard of execution is very high, the singing called forth the enthusiastic praise of Mr. Faning. He declared that nowhere before had he heard his part-song, "The shepherd's waking," performed so beautifully. The Blackburn Contest Choir gained the first place, the Blackpool Prize Choir and the Morecambe Madrigal Society following close behind. In the evening of the second day a concert was given by the united choirs under Mr. Faning. Mrs. Hutchinson sang solos and Mr. C. H. Fogg accompanied. The success of the arrangements was due to the labours of an excellent local committee working under the experienced supervision of Mr. J. W. Aldous, of Lancaster.

Madresfield.

The series of competitions instituted at Madresfield (Malvern) had their origin in the desire to do for this district what the Kendal competitions had accomplished in Westmoreland and district. Lady Mary Lygon is the moving spirit. This year's series was held on April 28 with the most encouraging success. There were about 700 competitors in the various choirs. The adjudicators included Miss Wakefield, Mr. Somervell, and Mr. Lionel Berger. A concert by the united adult choirs, under the skilful conductorship of Lady Mary Lygon, was given in the evening. The influence of this movement in the district is very great in promoting the study of part-singing.

Carlisle.

The third of the annual competitions at Carlisle took place on April 26 and 27. The only new event was a class for string quartets, but the competitions as a whole showed a steady growth, the standard of performance reaching a higher point than ever, and provoking the admiration of so experienced an expert as Dr. McNaught, who was, as on previous occasions, the judge.

BRITISH MUSIC AT BOLOGNA.

THE growing interest taken on the Continent in modern British music, and the increasing instances of concert performances taking place here and there, the programmes of which are entirely devoted to works by British composers, are facts at once significant and gratifying. They are especially gratifying when, as in the present instance, a really representative selection is offered and meets with such genuine and thorough appreciation. We refer to the concert given on April 24 by the Società del Quartetto, of Bologna, under the able direction of Signor Martucci, at the Teatro Communale, before a very numerous audience. The programme on this occasion included Sir Arthur Sullivan's "Tempest" music, Dr. Villiers Stanford's "Irish" Symphony, Sir Hubert Parry's Symphonic Variations, the Intermezzo from Sir A. C. Mackenzie's "Rose of Sharon," and Mr. Cowen's "In Fairyland." The reception accorded to these works was without exception a most favourable one, and the press organs are unanimous in their acknowledgment of the musicianlike workmanship, melodic charm, and marked individuality characterising them. The various local journals publish an extensive critical appreciation of the concert. One writer refers to it as a "magnificent success," and speaks of the impression created as a "revelation," thereby disproving the current notion in Italy that England is an "unmusical nation." The very able account given in the Gazzetta Musicale, of Milan, is equally laudatory. The last-named journal, after a brief historical sketch of the progress of music in England and an allusion to the fact of modern English composers gradually becoming better known outside their native country, welcomes the opportunity afforded to an Italian audience on the present occasion, and is glad to add that "the five English composers, selected with great artistic judgment by Signor Martucci, have met with a veritable triumph at Bologna, where their works, and indeed the existence of a modern English school, had been previously quite unknown."

Referring to the Prelude and Intermezzi from the "Tempest" music, the writer considers them "fully appropriate to their subject, with the poetic and descriptive elements predominating." Dr. Stanford's Symphony comes in for a considerable share of the critic's praise, more particularly its second and final movements. No less appreciative are his remarks with reference to Sir Hubert's Symphonic Variations, "a veritable symphony, indeed, of a lofty classical style, abounding in variety of colour and intricacy of combinations." "Sir Alexander Mackenzie's Intermezzo from the first part of the oratorio 'The Rose of Sharon,'" the critic goes on to say, "is a most charming little piece, a sweet and graceful fantasia, scored almost exclusively for stringed instruments, the effect produced by which is of the most tender, penetrating order. . . . This truly memorable concert terminated with the performance of two dances, Nos. 5 and 6, from Mr. Frederic Cowen's ballet 'In Fairyland,' which thoroughly delighted the audience on account of the originality and gracefulness displayed in them. Both between the different numbers in the programme and at the conclusion of the performance, Signor Martucci and his valiant orchestra were the recipients of prolonged and enthusiastic plaudits." There can be no doubt that a considerable share of the brilliant success achieved by this first production of English music in so important a musical centre as Bologna must be accorded to the ability of the conductor and of the forces under his command, and it is a pleasure to acknowledge our national indebtedness to this extent to Signor Martucci, who has furnished so excellent a practical demonstration of the interest which, it is well known, he has long taken in the works of contemporary English composers.

A HIGHLY interesting musical exhibition was inaugurated at the Mess Palast, Berlin, on the 7th ult., and will remain open until August 12. Contributions have been sent from all parts of Germany, Austria-Hungary, and other countries, the section of musical instruments being particularly rich in exhibits of special interest. Amongst these may be instanced the clavier used by the great Leipzig cantor, the travelling pianofortes of Frederick the Great and Mozart, and the grand pianofortes of Weber and Mendelssohn, all of them forming part of the Royal collection. Dr. Oscar Fleischer, the custodian of the latter, will deliver periodical lectures in the instrumental department.

REVIEWS.

Te Deum Laudamus and Benedictus in D. By Hamilton Robinson.

Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in F. By C. J. B. Meacham.

Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in D. By J. E. Adkins.

[Novello and Company, Limited.]

DR. HAMILTON ROBINSON'S setting of the Te Deum may be warmly recommended to choirmasters who have a well-trained body of vocalists, for the music is dignified and impressive to a remarkable degree, and the accentuation of the text is excellent. Four soloists are required as well as the usual four-part chorus, and the imitative entrances will require to be sung with precision to do justice to the music; but any extra practice that may be found necessary will be well repaid by the effectiveness of the writing. The setting is admirably suited for festivals, for which orchestral accompaniments may be obtained.

The setting of the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis, by Mr. Meacham, follows conventional lines, but is melodious, and its simplicity renders it available to the majority of church choirs.

The service by Mr. J. E. Adkins is also easy to sing, and the music flows with facility and grace. Passages for the several voices in unison considerably add to the effectiveness of the composition, which is calculated to interest a choir.

Four Characteristic Waltzes (Op. 22). Arranged for pianoforte solo, and violin and pianoforte, by the Composer, S. Coleridge-Taylor. [Novello and Company, Limited.]

THE adjective "characteristic" is not seldom applied to pieces which virtually possess no character save that of conventionality, but in Mr. Coleridge-Taylor's waltzes its use is thoroughly justified. It is very rare to find such marked individuality in conception and treatment in so young a composer, and pianists and violinists in search of fresh and original music may be warmly recommended these waltzes. They were originally designed for orchestra, but they are very effective as pianoforte pieces, and still more so when the assistance of a violin is secured. The first, in E minor, is headed "Allegro ma non troppo," and opens with a flowing melody which possesses great entrain, and is admirably contrasted with a second subject that has much in common with the sentiment of lands where the sun blazes fiercely. The second waltz is in A, and, although less distinctive, possesses no less individuality. Number three is directed to be played Andante con sentimento, and its chief melody might be that of the song of an ardent lover, so expressive and impassioned is its burden. If this be taken as its sentiment, the final waltz, Allegro furioso, might with equal justification be said to suggest the mental whirlwind of his subsequent jealousy—a jealousy that brooks no control and burns like fire. The distinction of this music does not merely pertain to the themes, it is no less apparent in the harmonic scheme and command of rhythm. Indubitable conviction seems to rush into utterance with the blind confidence of instinct. Chords having little or nothing in common are welded together as with a blow, and the parlour pathos of the conventional waltz is consumed by a virile spirit that converts its usual monotonous beat into heart-throbs.

Interludes. By the late Henry Charles Banister.

[George Bell and Sons.]

The Harmonising of Melodies. A text-book for students and teachers. By Henry C. Banister.

[Office of "Music," Wardour Street, Soho.]

THE late Henry Charles Banister was one of those thoughtful-minded musicians whose utterances command respectful attention. He is widely known as the author of a text-book on harmony, first issued many years ago, his other contributions to musical literature including: "Lectures on Musical Analysis" and a very exhaustive "Life" of his friend the late Sir George Macfarren. The first of the posthumous volumes now before us gives ample evidence of that wide reading, ripe judgment, and earnestness of purpose which were highly characteristic attributes of its author. "Interludes" consist of seven lectures delivered between the years 1891 and 1897. The subjects are "The uses of musical knowledge," "The appreciation of music," "Music and preaching" (delivered before the students of a Theological College), "The development of movement structure," "Some thoughts concerning musical composition," "Counterpoint in modern free composition," and "The music of the Victorian era." Every page of the books contains words of wisdom, which the student of music would do well to assimilate. Some of the views therein expressed may not always meet with approval; but no one can peruse the volume without the conviction that Mr. Banister's "Interludes" are the product of the fine mind of a deeply earnest musician. The book has been carefully edited by Mr. Stewart Macpherson, who has contributed a preface. An excellent portrait of Mr. Banister with a fac-simile signature forms the frontispiece.

The "Harmonising of Melodies" is, as might be assumed, a technical treatise upon a subject which has not hitherto received much attention from the writers of text-books on harmony. In the sixty-seven pages of this little book, Mr. Banister gives many valuable hints which will prove useful to both teachers and pupils. Everyone will agree with the author's opening sentence: "The harmonising of melodies is one of the most obvious, practical applications of the knowledge of chords and their treatment, which is generally termed the knowledge of harmony." In conclusion, we gladly commend these two volumes to the notice of our readers as books that they should "read, mark, learn, and inwardly digest."

Suite for Violin and Pianoforte. Composed by Edward German. [Novello and Company, Limited.]

MR. GERMAN'S suite was originally written for flute and pianoforte, but it is not less effective when the former instrument is replaced by the violin—in fact, players of the latter instrument will doubtless deem the music to be much more acceptable by the procedure. There are three numbers. The first is a waltz of pleasantly optimistic character, possessing bright and genial melodies well supported by the pianoforte part. This is followed by a slow movement, entitled "Souvenir," the nature of which is rather that of pleasant remembrance than regret. It is, however, not without passion, and is decidedly expressive, especially in the pianissimo passages, which, delicately played, would be very charming. The most developed number is the last, which runs over fourteen pages. It is a Gipsy Dance—one of those measures the execution of which is accepted as forming an important part of the lives of corybantic gipsies in nebulous climes. The music is very energetic, and has a wild, forceful spirit that calls for considerable verve on the part of the violinist to do it justice. The pianoforte part is not difficult, but it demands firmness and quickness of touch, and intelligent players will not fail to notice the suggestive inner part, partaking of the nature of a ground bass, at the commencement of the third section.

Six Easy Pieces for Violin and Pianoforte. Composed by Max Oesten. [Novello and Company, Limited.]

MR. MAX OESTEN'S pieces are decidedly attractive examples of their kind. They are contained in two books: those in the first collection being respectively entitled "Morning Song," "Siciliano," and "The Beggar Child"—names which may serve to suggest to the player the expression desired by the composer. Those in the second book are named "Full Moon in the Mountains," "Legend of the Rhine," and "Gavotte." All the pieces are distinguished by a graceful melodiousness and a directness of expression that make them very pleasing. They will present few executive difficulties to average players, demanding a sympathetic style more than brilliancy of technique. Moreover, their effectiveness is greater than their pretention, the reverse of that which frequently results from endeavours to be original.

PIANOFORTE MUSIC.—Novellette in D. By Camille de Sarasin (Robert Cocks and Co.). This is a bright, gay little piece, melodious and graceful, and easy of execution.——Suite Moderne. By C. H. Clutsam (Robert Cocks and Co.). This suite consists of a Minuet, Passepied, Sarabande, and Rigaudon, severally conceived in the spirit which dictated the original forms of these dances. They are very playable, and will present few difficulties to pianists of average executive ability.——Norwegian Boatmen's Song. By G. Lardelli (Edwin Ashdown). Pianists in search of easy and melodious music may be recommended this unpretentious composition, which decidedly presents the bright side of boatmen's lives.——Folle Farine, Danse piquante, by T. H. Frewin (Charles Woolhouse), justifies its descriptive sub-title and is attractive light music.——Of two studies, respectively entitled Il Penseroso and L'Allegro, composed by Clement Harris (Metzler and Co.), the latter is likely to meet with most favour, not only because it is easier, but because if well played it would form a brilliant and expressive piece.——Forest Scenes. By M. Schyralski (Agate and Co.). These are three in number and are severally entitled "Springtime," "Midsummer's-day," and "Autumn leaves." They are well written and will repay any practice they may require for their due performance.——Four Short Pieces, by Walter Bloxham (Charles Vincent, 9, Berners Street), are expressive and of moderate difficulty. The first, entitled "The Request," suggests doubt as to what the answer may be. The second, called "Pleading," urges its suit in a manner that indicates the "eternal masculine." No. 3, "Hoping," seems to imply confidence, and the coquettish nature of No. 4 is indicative that "the answer" is given by a lady.

THE St. James's Choral Society gave, at the end of April, its seventh concert in the Public Buildings, Handsworth, in the presence of a large and appreciative audience. The chief piece in the programme was Gade's cantata "The Crusaders." The chorus was well balanced, and good service was rendered by the principals, who included the following: Miss Aimée Wathen (soprano), Mr. W. Molineaux (tenor), Mr. H. England (baritone). Mr. B. Nock and Miss Cleobury were responsible for the accompaniments, which were given on an American organ and pianoforte. Mr. R. Richards conducted.

The Warwick Musical Society gave a concert in the Shire Hall, under Mr. W. H. Bellamy's conductorship. The programme included Spohr's "Last Judgment" and Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise." The soprano music was taken by Miss Clara Monteith; the tenor being Mr. Albert Collings (Christ Church, Oxford), and the bass, Mr. R. A. Grant (Wells Cathedral). There was a full band and chorus. The performance was of much interest and excellence.

The Birmingham Choral and Orchestral Association gave a performance of Mendelssohn's "Elijah" in the Town Hall, on Saturday evening, April 23. Although late in the season, the concert attracted a large audience. Mr. Joseph H. Adams conducted and had a well balanced chorus and fairly good orchestra under his direction. The principals included two artists who had not been previously heard here. These were Madame Asher Taylor (soprano) and Mr. Tom Child (tenor). Miss Madge Robottom, our local contralto, made a successful début on this occasion as an oratorio singer, and Mr. William Evans again proved himself an admirable and powerful exponent of the part of Elijah. Mr. C. W. Perkins occupied his customary post at the organ.

The Birmingham Amateur Orchestral Society gave a concert in the large Lecture Theatre of the Midland Institute, on the 5th ult., under Mr. George Halford's conductorship. The orchestra of over sixty performers included a small contingent of professional players. The programme included Svendsen's second Symphony in B flat (Op. 15), which was given for the first time here in its complete form. The novelty of the evening was the Symphonic Poem "Steppenskizze," by Borodin. The other purely orchestral pieces consisted of Tschaikowsky's "Tema con variazioni," from the Suite, Op. 55; Saint-Saëns's Prelude for strings, "Le Déluge"; Hamish MacCunn's Overture, "The Land of the Mountain and the Flood"; and the March from Berlioz's "Faust." The vocal portion of the programme was entrusted to Miss Gwen Cosslett (soprano) and Mr. Ivor Foster (baritone).

The musical matinées in connection with the Royal Society of Artists are becoming more popular from season to season, and are now looked upon as a regular local institution. Mr. Oscar Pollack, the musical director, has been fortunate in securing a large number of vocalists and instrumentalists, and the programmes have been throughout of an artistic and varied standard.

MUSIC IN BRISTOL.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE chief musical event of the month was the performance, on April 30, by the Bristol Choral Society, of Berlioz's "Faust." The extraordinary work was finely interpreted, if not quite perfectly, by the choir and band of 600 members. The singers unfolded the intricate choruses with freedom, unity, and expression. The principal vocalists were Madame Emily Squire, Messrs. Branscombe, Andrew Black, and Montague Worlock, who excellently discharged their duties. The band splendidly played the Hungarian March and the Ballet of Sylphs, and the former was encored. Mr. Riseley conducted with his customary watchfulness. The concert brought to a close the most successful season the Society has had.

The tasteful singing by 600 juveniles of part-songs and other pieces, under the direction of Mr. G. T. Cooke, at the Bristol Band of Hope Union annual festival, on the 2nd ult., is deserving of record.

On the 14th ult. the Bristol and Clifton Philharmonic Society, a young body, gave its concluding concert of the season. The choir creditably sang Schubert's "Song of Miriam" (the soloist being Miss Lucile Hill), Gade's "Spring's Message," and two part-songs by Edward German. The band played Mendelssohn's "Athalie" Overture, Beethoven's "Egmont" Overture, and his "Emperor" Concerto, with Miss Gertrude Peppercorn, a remarkably clever girl, at the pianoforte; Raff's "Fest" March, and an arrangement of Walther's "Preislied" from Wagner's "Meistersinger," the solo violinist and harpist being Mr. Harold Bernard and Miss Florence Lane respectively.

MUSIC IN DUBLIN.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

AT the Mansion House concert, on the 12th ult., in aid of the distress in the West and South of Ireland, a very large audience assembled, and a substantial sum was added to the Relief Fund. A most attractive programme of music was admirably rendered by the following artists: Miss Lucy Ashton Hackett, Miss Shellard, Miss Alex Elsner, Mr. Walter Bapty, Mr. J. F. Jones, and Mr. Charles Kelly (vocalists), Mr. Harry Charles (pianoforte), Signor de Angelis (violin), and Herr Bast (violoncello). The Dublin Glee Singers, under the direction of Mr. Joseph Seymour, were cordially received after their Belfast victory, and their selections were heartily applauded, especially Mr. Seymour's choral setting of "Savourneen Deelish." The band of the Dublin Metropolitan Police, conducted by Mr. James Conroy, played during the intervals, and the entire concert was under the direction of Dr. T. R. G. Jozé.

The Leinster Section of the Incorporated Society of Musicians held its annual conversazione at the Antient Concert Rooms on the 14th ult. A large number of visitors were entertained, and the following compositions by members of the Section were included in the musical programme: Motet, "O Domina mea," by Dr. Joseph Smith; Sonata for violin and pianoforte (Op. 32), by M. Esposito; two quartets for male voices, by Dr. T. R. G. Jozé; song, "The coming of Spring," by Dr. J. C. Culwick; and a string quartet, by Herr Bast.

MUSIC IN EAST ANGLIA.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE eleventh concert of the Norwich Orchestral Union was made more than usually interesting by the production, for the first time in Norwich, of the incidental music composed by Mozart for an historical drama, "Thamos, King of Egypt," a work which, from the weakness of the libretto, had but slight success upon its production in 1790; but the three noble choruses written for the work are well known to musicians, as adapted for church use under their Latin titles: "Splendente te, Deus," "Deus, tibi laus et honor," and "Ne pulvis et cinis." The work consists of five entr'actes or interludes and the three choruses already named. It must be admitted the Orchestral Union, carefully conducted by Mr. Ernest Harcourt, was somewhat overweighted by the music, although the Society deserves the thanks of local musicians for the opportunity afforded them to become acquainted with the composition. A series of connective readings, which had been specially arranged for the occasion, were recited by Miss Florence Burton, and added considerably to the interest of the audience. We understand these are likely to be incorporated with any new edition of "Thamos, King of Egypt," that may appear. Mr. Kingston Rudd and Mr. Arthur Bent were heard with much delight in Dussek's charming Sonata in B flat for pianoforte and violin, the piquant Rondo being especially welcome. Miss Charlotte Dickens introduced several songs in good style, sundry overtures and part-songs completing a too lengthy programme.

The second concert of the season under the auspices of the Norwich "Gate House" Choir was given in Noverre's Room, on the 5th ult., with signal success. The chief feature in the programme for the choir was Weber's tuneful cantata "Three Seasons," which includes a happy combination of solo and choral numbers. The solos, taken by members of the Society, were sung with much taste and effect, while the choir did ample justice to the choruses. Specially good work was also done in several part-songs, the careful training of Mr. Kingston Rudd, the conductor, being noticeable in the gradations of tone produced. The services of Mr. Aldo Antonietti, one of our youngest violinists, had been engaged, who, in addition to playing two movements from Lalo's Concerto Russe (Op. 29) and Wieniawski's "Souvenir de Moscow" with startling vigour and grace, also joined Mr. Kingston Rudd in Beethoven's Pianoforte and Violin Sonata in G (Op. 30, No. 3), with the result that a fine performance of the work was rapturously applauded at its close.

The ninety-fifth concert given by the Norwich Philharmonic Society took place at Noverre's Room, on the 18th ult., and proved a great success, more taste and refinement being exhibited by the members of the band than has usually been noticeable. The feature of the concert was Miss Mary Noverre's (late Norfolk Scholar at the Royal College of Music) rendering of Max Bruch's Violin Concerto (No. 1) in G minor with orchestral accompaniment. No professor of the instrument should undertake this work unless prepared to combat with the difficulties with which it bristles, and happily Miss Noverre's teaching and intelligence enabled her to overcome them without trouble, while the orchestra ably backed her efforts. Songs were contributed by Miss Edith Rema and Mr. W. R. Gurley, the latter an amateur recently imported into Norwich.

The thirty-ninth concert of the Great Yarmouth Musical Society was given in the Town Hall on April 22. Greater interest than usual was felt in the event from the fact that Sir Hubert Parry had consented to conduct his "Ode on St. Cecilia's Day." In anticipation of this event, Mr. Haydon Hare, the Society's energetic conductor, had prepared both choir and band with more than usual care, so that Sir Hubert was able to speak of the performance as excellent in every way. Miss Agnes Nicholls and Mr. Dan Price were responsible for the solos contained in the work.

The East Dereham Choral Society gave a concert in the Corn Hall on April 27, conducted by Dr. Horace Hill. A selection from the "Creation" filled the first half of the programme, the soloists engaged being Miss Amy Rayson, Miss May Seiber, Mr. Sawford Dye, and Mr. E. Freeman. The accompaniments were provided by Dr. Bunnett and Mr. H. G. Himson (pianoforte), with Mr. A. R. Lowne at the harmonium.

The new organ erected in New Buckenham Church, by Messrs. Samuel and Twyford, was opened at a special service, on April 22, by Dr. Edward Bunnett, the sermon being preached by the Lord Bishop of Thetford. The greater part of the cost was defrayed by S. L. Cocks, Esq., of Diss, father of the present vicar of New Buckenham, and a member of the firm of Messrs. R. Cocks and Co., whose progenitors were intimately connected with the parish.

It speaks well for musical culture when Haydn's "Creation" can be attempted, aye, and creditably performed, in a small town like Hadleigh, Suffolk. On the 11th ult. this was accomplished in the fine Parish Church by the Hadleigh Musical Society, conducted by Mr. J. C. Coldwell. The soloists were Master Willie Child, Master Henry Evans, Mr. Sadleur Browne, and Mr. Charles Hinchliff. With the help of Mr. G. E. Pratt at the organ, the band and chorus gave a good account of their share in the work.

MUSIC IN LIVERPOOL.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE annual meeting of the Liverpool Philharmonic Society was held on the 10th ult., under the presidency of Mr. John Wilson, when the balance-sheet showed a highly satisfactory state of finance. The customary twelve concerts are to be given next season, but no information was accorded as to the music to be performed.

What is always an interesting event and an important one in the eyes of many thousands of persons in this city, as well as of a still larger number in the principality of Wales, of which Liverpool is continually spoken of as the metropolis, took place on April 27. It has been customary for the Welsh Presbyterians to muster annually in vast numbers at their psalmody festival in Hengler's Circus, and on the occasion in question 1,500 choristers and an orchestra of fifty performers put in an appearance. The conductor was Mr. David Jenkins, of Aberystwith, and the singers had been recruited from the choirs of the following Presbyterian churches: Prince's Road, Chatham Street, David Street, Fitzclarence Street, Netherfield Road, Crosshall Street, Anfield Road, Newsham Park, Walton Park, Peel Road, Holt Road, Webster Road, Stanley Road (Bootle), Parkfield (Birkenhead), Liscard Road (Egremont), Chester Road (Rock Ferry), Portland Street (Southport), New Brighton, Garston, Waterloo, Huyton Quarry, and West Kirby. The singing was, on the whole, excellent, and the effect when the enormous audience united with the choirs in singing some of the traditional tunes of the Connection was impressively grand.

The most recent event to be recorded in the way of regular concerts is that of the performance of the Goossens Choir, on April 26. It is three or four years since this organisation was formed, and it has since then been its business to study and commit to memory several of those extensive choral compositions which, familiar enough to musicians in certain parts of the European continent, are, unfortunately, but little known in England. Among these may be recorded Gevaert's "Exiles of Erin," Riga's "Hymn of Life," and Denefve's "Nocturne," which found a place in Mr. Goossens's latest programme. Absolute perfection of phrasing and intonation as well as the most intensely delicate gradations of expression are attributes of the choir under notice, though the conditions of memorising every note, word, and detail means the accomplishment of a task of no ordinary difficulty.

On the 3rd and 9th ult. respectively were given the two last recitals of Beethoven's sonatas by Mr. Steudner-Welsing, who accomplished the feat of playing the entire series from memory, not only without a single slip, but with the most masterly technique and perfection of appreciation. Such performances are but rarely given, and those in question proved of the highest interest, both from the educational view taken by students and the probably larger number of the general amateur order of auditors who attended Mr. Welsing's cycle.

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE recently concluded visit of the Royal Carl Rosa Company has been unusually pleasant and instructive to the keen lovers of the lyric drama, although possibly not so profitable to the managers as was anticipated. The Company was never in such good form as at present, or so satisfactory to those who appreciate an all-round completeness rather than the predominance of some all-absorbing star. The band is immensely improved; the wind being decidedly good and the strings, perhaps, as full as could be afforded, and under the direction of either Herr Eckhold or M. Jacquinot the music flows on with delightful smoothness. The fresh-voiced choir yet needs somewhat of the drill of the stage manager; although there remains but little of the old stolid indifference to what is going on in front of the grouped singers however tragic the scene may be. Among the principals still, one or two seem to think that very slight vocal ability is needed in combination with a power to move about the stage in a self-possessed manner; and there are still one or two who imagine that dramatic action consists in waving the arms about in a manner suggestive of swimming, alternately with a clasping of the breast as though suffering from some spasmodic pain. There is a fair supply of tenors, including Messrs. Brozel, Salvi, and Cunningham, an ample list of qualified baritones, among whom Mr. Lemprière Pringle yet remains, and Mr. Charles Tilbury evidently intends to come more and more to the front, as a powerful and well-attuned voice and distinct enunciation entitle him to do. Among the sopranos are two or three intelligent young singers, especially Miss Bessie Macdonald, who is a model Marguerite ("Faust"), and in the Margarita of "The Martyr of Antioch" was perfectly charming; her acting, singing, and facial expression all showing keen musical and dramatic instincts of high order. The only misgiving one could have concerning Miss Macdonald's future is caused by some dread lest her physical endurance may not be equal to the demands made upon it. Miss Kirkby Lunn has been most useful, and, after experience of some of her predecessors, has been as acceptable as indefatigable. In spite of some drawback in the mode of production, which her tutors should have prevented and which may endanger the permanence of her voice, she sings with intelligence and acts with a freedom which must increase with greater experience of stage requirements.

Each visit of the Royal Carl Rosa Company is marked by the production of some works fresh to a provincial audience, and this time three novelties have been presented. Sullivan's "Martyr of Antioch" has been so seldom given in the concert-room that any chance of listening to its charming music is extremely welcome; and whatever slight lack of dramatic action there may be—and it is slight indeed—was more than atoned for by the added spectacular attraction. Those who saw and heard Miss Macdonald as the heroine will not fail to avail themselves of any opportunity of renewing the pleasure.

A description of "Tristan and Isolde" is not needed. By this time the plot is well known to most students, and limits of space forbid any attempt to discuss the propriety of the composer's method, or whether he was indeed able, in "Tristan," to cast himself "fearlessly into the waves of the great sea of music" and to "spread melody boldly out, that it may flow like an unbroken stream through the whole work." In the representation of the opera, Mr. Tilbury, as Kurwenal, was admirable, Miss Lunn was most useful, while in the larger parts of Tristan and Isolde Mr. Brozel was not inefficient and Miss Rita Elandi was decidedly overweighted.

A little timidity, perhaps, it was which prevented the introduction of "Diarmid" till the penultimate night of the season. The first opera of Mr. Hamish MacCunn failed to seize upon the public taste through an unbroken simplicity which became monotonous; and, in his second effort, the composer seems to have been determined not to suffer through a similar weakness. Incidents of startling nature are crowded in—incursions of Norsemen, visions of Walhalla, of Freya, of hobgoblins, gnomes, fairies, and of all sorts of apparitions.

The libretto of the Marquis of Lorne is, like that of "Tristan," founded upon the intrigue of the hero with the wife of the King, and has, therefore, somewhat of the unsavoury odour of the present fashion. Fionn, the deceived monarch, is not forgiving, like the King Mark of the other tale; but instead of a long and tiresomely reproachful sermon, proceeds speedily to a mean revenge upon his betrayer, and causes him to be wounded in the only place not rendered invulnerable by the Northern gods. On reading the plot it seems as though a second edition of the Wagner opera were inevitable; but whatever may be the shortcomings of "Diarmid," Mr. MacCunn is deserving of warm thanks for having refused to imitate the now popular master. There are two or three little bits the repetition of which excites a suspicion of some Wagnerian treatment, such as the phrase following the last utterance of Eila—King Fionn's love-sick daughter—which is taken from the opening of her first song; and a peculiar consecution of chords, originally appearing at the close of the first chorus, and afterwards in the "Waltz of the Fairies"; but the situations are so different that no special significance could be attached to the quotation. All those familiar with the songs of the composer well know how often a melody which commences naturally loses its simplicity by some odd twist of the tune, or by its wandering through some strange and forced harmonies; and the same perversity characterises so much of the writing in "Diarmid," as to cause the fear that Mr. MacCunn may be possessed by a feeling of contempt for that consistency of purpose which lies as the basis of true satisfaction in art. There are moments when the listener begins to congratulate himself upon having seized hold of a strain which may serve as a warp running through a well-woven fabric; but the thread breaks and he is thrown back among chromatic scales, among crude chords of the diminished seventh, or into sequential streams which often (unlike most streams) flow upward, rising with a persistent mannerism by successive semitones. A great deal of the scoring is clever, but very unhelpful to the singer, and ineffective through the very skilfulness of its complication. There are two—and, I fear, only two—movements which will survive: Eila's ballad, "Heavy is thy burden," and the sprightly little duet in the fourth act, "The cherry and the rowan."

MUSIC IN NORTHUMBERLAND AND DURHAM.

On Wednesday, April 20, Mr. Elgar's cantata "King Olaf" was given in the Town Hall, Middlesbrough. Madame Duma, Mr. Lloyd Chandos, and Mr. W. Thornton were the soloists, the chorus and orchestra being that of the Middlesbrough Musical Union, Mr. Kilburn conducting. An arrangement had been made whereby the district was to have had the honour of a visit from the composer, who was to have conducted his own music; but illness, combined with great pressure of work, chiefly in connection with the new cantata ("Caractacus") for the Leeds Festival, rendered this impossible. It is hoped, however, that this visit is only postponed until another season. As in other places, the effect produced by "King Olaf" was of a most vivid kind, and further knowledge of this composition tends more and more to the recognition in it of those qualities of lengthy popularity and genuine musical merit, which are unfortunately none too common in the works of contemporary composers. Wagner once said: "Without melody there is no music," and the dearth of true tune is the bane of many of the works of our time. Mr. Elgar is not, however, afflicted with any such "melodic dryness." He is no mere "passage" writer; nay, rather does he so revel in tunefulness that the mind is at times somewhat bewildered by the mazes of melody which crowd his score. Many a page of "King Olaf" will attest the accuracy of this statement. In free and spontaneous flow of ideas he reminds one of Dvorák, while in the happy and unstrained use of Leitmotiven he displays a power not unworthy of the great Bayreuth master himself. This is high praise, but that it is by no means exaggerated is clear from the universal approval which has been accorded to "King Olaf."

At Bishop Auckland, Mr. Elgar's excellent setting of our old English legend "The Banner of St. George" was performed by the Auckland Musical Society, under Mr. Kilburn, on Thursday, April 21, and produced a marked effect. The brilliant orchestration, combined with genuine tunefulness which characterises this little work, ought to make it a universal favourite. In few modern pieces of its convenient dimensions do we find so grateful a combination of qualities. The parts for the several voices of the chorus are well distributed; all have something to do which is at once effective and pleasant to the performance, and the artistic result is entirely satisfactory. In addition to "St. George," Bach's cantata "My spirit was in heaviness" was also given on this occasion. This was the first time that one of Bach's shorter works has been given here, and the quaint and classic beauties of the music were highly appreciated. Madame Duma and Mr. Charles Tree were the soloists, and the Rev. L. Wilkinson and Mrs. Walton took part in the quartets. Mr. Theo. Hornung and Mr. W. Wilkinson assisted in the accompaniments.

MUSIC IN SHEFFIELD AND DISTRICT.

The past season in Sheffield has been a busy and profitable one. Financial success has attended almost every concert venture, a result due, no doubt, to the prosperous condition of trade. Next season will see some important developments in one or two of the existing musical societies of the city. Already the forthcoming festival is casting its shadow before. The various committees have been formed and one or two composers of the first rank have been approached with regard to a new work.

The Spring concert of the Amateur Musical Society took place on the 3rd ult., when Mr. Frederick Corder's fine cantata the "Bridal of Triermain" occupied the first part of the programme. This beautiful work had been performed by the Society ten years ago, and its marked success on that occasion justified its repetition. Mr. Schollhammer conducted, his assistants being Mr. J. W. Phillips (organ) and Mr. J. Peck (leader). The principals were drawn from the ranks of the Society.

The Amateur Instrumental Society closed its twenty-sixth season with a successful concert on the 5th ult. Under Dr. Henry Coward's direction, Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony was accorded an intelligent and thoroughly enjoyable interpretation. The players were equally excellent in Brahms's "Academische Fest-Ouverture," which proved the feature of the concert. Mr. J. T. Hill led the orchestra. The vocalists were Miss Ada Freeman and Mr. F. Shimeld.

The Male Glee and Madrigal Society gave its second concert in the Music Hall, Surrey Street, on the 10th ult. The Society, which numbers about fifty voices, includes most of the leading church choristers of the city. The refined and altogether admirable character of the singing at the concert augurs well for the permanence and progress of the organisation. Mendelssohn's "To the Sons of Art" had a vigorous and well shaded rendering, while in Pearsall's madrigal, "The River Spirit's Song," the sustained singing was admirable. Hiles's "Hushed in death," Horsley's "By Celia's Arbour," and half-a-dozen shorter pieces were also successfully given. Dr. Heinrich Pudor, a clever violoncellist, and Mr. J. A. Rodgers, played solos on the violoncello and pianoforte respectively, and Madame Cann de Saint-Allais sang airs by Massé and Faure with much charm and skill. Mr. J. A. Rodgers conducted.

MUSIC IN PARIS.

(From our own Correspondent.)

An important event at the Opéra was the début, on the 9th ult., of Mdlle. Delna in Meyerbeer's "Le Prophète." Her assumption of the part of Fidès proved in every way worthy of the reputation of this celebrated vocalist, while demonstrating once more the surprising versatility of her talent. It was a veritable triumph for the artist, and endorsed as such by her audience. The performance generally (the work has not been given here for some six years) was an excellent one, with Madame Bosman, MM. Alvarez, Tournets, Gresse, Berthet, and Cabillot completing the cast. The première of "La Cloche du Rhin," M. Rousseau's new opera, was announced to take place at the end of last month.

M. Vincent d'Indy's "Fervaal" was given for the first time at the Opéra Comique on the 10th ult. This opera, as readers of THE MUSICAL TIMES are aware, has already been produced in Brussels, and was therefore not unknown to some of our critics here; its production in Paris, however, was an event of special importance in the estimation of a certain number of musicians who look upon M. d'Indy as the head of their school. Let it be said at once that there can be no question whatever of M. d'Indy's very considerable talent. At the same time, it seems doubtful whether his present work will succeed in gaining the appreciation of the public. An accumulation of scientific devices, however remarkable from the musician's point of view, is less calculated to strike the auditor than spontaneous musical inspiration, the outcome of emotion, and therefore communicative. The composer of "Fervaal" is supposed to be a follower of Wagner, and he has certainly always shown himself one of the most fervent admirers of that master. Nevertheless, his present score is characterised, not unfrequently, by a want of animation far removed from the penetrant harmonies of the Bayreuth master. Where the influence of the latter shows itself preponderant appears mainly in the analogy of certain situations. Those well acquainted with Wagner's music-dramas meet with similarities in the plot of "Fervaal" which cannot fail to impede their interest in its development.

There are some fine choruses in the second act of powerful, sonorous effect, while the third act is remarkable for amplitude of expression and real grandeur of conception. To sum up, "Fervaal" is undoubtedly a remarkable work which does honour to the French school; while as to its place in the history of the lyrical drama, it must be looked upon as the result of Wagnerian influences rather than as a new departure in its development. The interpretation was an excellent one, with Madame J. Raunay, MM. Imbart de la Tour and Beyle in the principal parts; choristers and orchestra grappled well with the difficulties which abound in the score. M. Carré, the new director, has spared no efforts in the mounting of the first new work brought out by him, the scenery, particularly that of the mountains of the Cevennes, being greatly admired.

The season of the grand orchestral concert institutions has come to a close. Only M. Colonne continues to offer some attractions to amateurs by way of extra performances at popular prices, in which have been included Berlioz's "La Damnation de Faust," also a new vocal composition by M. Saint-Saëns, "Le Lever du Soleil," interpreted by Madame Heylon, and the re-appearance, after his American tour, of M. Raoul Pugno. Pianists' appearances in the concert-room are, however, still numerous, and the recitals given by Mr. Harold Bauer, MM. de la Borde, Risler, Foerster, Madame Roger-Miclos, and others continue to be well attended. At the concert given by M. Viardot, on April 28, a considerable portion of the programme was devoted to the mélodies of M. René Lenormand, which the audience, numerous as always at M. Viardot's concerts, greatly appreciated.

Under the title of "La Société des Concerts du Conservatoire de 1828 à 1897," a highly interesting volume has just been published here from the pen of M. Daudelot. It includes an essay on the history of symphonic music since the beginning of the present century, with the portraits of some noted orchestral conductors.

MUSIC IN AMERICA.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

MR. WALTER HENRY HALL, conductor of the Brooklyn Oratorio Society and organist and choirmaster of St. James's, directed an excellent performance of Gounod's "Redemption," in the Brooklyn Academy of Music, on April 18. Mr. Hall's chorus numbers 175 voices; he had an orchestra from New York, and the following soloists: Effie Stewart, Alice Merritt, Edith Miller, Theo. van Yorx, and David Bispham. The chorus showed excellent training, the attack was precise, the phrasing intelligent, and the tone pure and well balanced.

The New York Oratorio Society, founded by Leopold Damrosch twenty-five years ago, has been giving a festival in Carnegie Hall, New York City, in commemoration of the completion of its semi-jubilee. The performances extended over four days (April 12 to 16) and included some of the compositions which were given at the first concert in 1873, as well as Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust," Parker's "St. Christopher," and Mendelssohn's "Elijah."

The chief interest in the festival was centred in Professor Parker's "St. Christopher," which here received its first performance. The composer occupies the chair of music at Yale College and is organist and choirmaster of Trinity Church, Boston. His first oratorio, "Hora Novissima," produced some four years ago, was immediately recognised as a work of real merit, which placed Professor Parker in the front rank of American composers. In this earlier work Professor Parker kept within the lines of the old oratorio, dividing the composition into two parts with eleven distinct numbers, and employing the ecclesiastical style.

"The Legend of St. Christopher" is a dramatic oratorio cast in quite a different mould. There are three acts, with eleven distinct scenes, and several orchestral portions of considerable length. The story is that of a giant, Offerus, who desires to serve the greatest earthly monarch, and seeks King Oriens that he may be his slave; but upon finding that the King fears the Devil, renounces his allegiance and offers himself to the Prince of Darkness. Here again he finds he is not serving the master, for the Devil trembles before the Cross, and Offerus turns again to give his service to Christ. He is commanded to build him a hut near a rushing river which many cross in danger, and there do His service in carrying all safely over. In the night a child's voice cries "Offerus, wilt thou not bear Me across?" and Offerus, obeying the call, bears, unknowing, the Christ Child, and is baptised Christopher.

This story has been put into verse by Mrs. Isabella Parker, the composer's mother. Professor Parker has used characteristic phrases to a considerable extent, as was inevitable in a dramatic work, and in the portions devoted to Offerus, Satan, and the Demons, the music is most vivid in its portrayal. In the orchestral portions the style is very modern, yet there is reserve in the instrumentation, thus rendering the composer's devices generally clear and effective. But the finest portions of the work lie in the scenes where the composer is dealing with purely religious subjects and where the musical structure is more solid. There the mind is quite able to grasp the ideas as a whole, and one feels no confusion. For it must be admitted that where structure and a strong harmonic basis are sacrificed for dramatic reasons, there is always more or less incoherence unless the dramatic action is presented at the same time.

The performance, under the direction of Walter Damrosch, attracted many of the conductors and composers from neighbouring cities, among them Mr. George Chadwick, who gave "St. Christopher" at the Springfield Festival in May. The soloists were as follows: Emma Such, Van Yorx, Ffrangcon-Davies, Ericsson Bushnell, and Harry Smith (boy soprano).

The second performance of this work took place at the Albany music festival on the 4th ult., under the conductorship of Mr. Elliot Schenck, with a chorus of 200 voices.

The third performance, and by far the best yet heard, took place at Springfield, on the 6th ult. The occasion was the tenth annual festival of the Hampden County Musical Association, and will remain a memorable one in the annals of that Society. The chorus, consisting of some 300 voices, admirably balanced, had been most carefully trained by its conductor, Mr. G. F. Chadwick; and the orchestra, from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, was in all respects as nearly perfect as possible. The composer conducted. The following was the cast: The Queen (soprano), Miss C. Maconda; the King (tenor), Barron Berthald; Satan (baritone), Gwylym Miles; Offerus (bass), D. Ffrangcon-Davies. Special mention should be made of Mr. Miles's rendering of the part of Satan, which was highly dramatic and effective. Mr. Davies was, of course, all that could be desired as Offerus, except for a slight liberty which he took at the end of one of his solos.

The work contains several lovely melodies, and whenever it can be given under such ideal circumstances as at Springfield it will without doubt receive a warm welcome. Why does not some enterprising English conductor present this American novelty to his audience?

The eighth annual festival services of the Choir Guild of the Diocese of Long Island were held on Wednesday, the 11th ult. The morning service, with choral celebration, was held at St. Ann's Church, under the direction of Mr. E. I. Horseman, Jun. There was a fair attendance and the service was carefully rendered. The evening service with the united choirs, numbering upwards of 400 voices, took place at Garden City Cathedral. Dr. W. H. Woodcock conducted. Mr. Frank Wright presided at the organ, and the voices were further supported by cornets, trombones, drums, and pianoforte; the latter played by Mr. E. I. Horseman, Jun. The service consisted of Sir G. C. Martin's Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in B flat, with organ and brass; very well rendered with the exception of the quartet. The anthem was "I beheld, and lo" (Elvey). "But who may abide" was sung while the offertory was being taken, and immediately after the three following anthems were sung: "Prepare ye the way" (Garrett), "By Babylon's wave" (Gounod), "Hail, gladdening light" (Martin). Stainer's magnificent Recessional "The God of Abraham praise" brought the service to a close. The Right Rev. Bishop Littlejohn attended, with a goodly gathering of the clergy.

Dr. Woodcock is to be congratulated on the excellent work done by the combined choirs. We understand that very little time was allowed for rehearsals, and that most of them were personally conducted by Dr. Woodcock. A pleasing departure from the usual course was the presentation of one of the handsome festival books, printed by Novello and Co., Limited, to each of the subscribers. A word of praise is due to Mr. Wm. Nungasser and Mr. T. R. Phillips for the capital way in which all the arrangements were carried out.

MUSIC IN MONTREAL.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The most important musical event of the past season in Montreal was the Festival of the Philharmonic Society, which took place on April 12, 13, and 14. As on this occasion the Society celebrated its coming of age, extraordinary preparations had been made to render the concerts worthy of such a notable event. The choral works performed were Berlioz's "Damnation of Faust" (third time by the Society) and Gounod's "Romeo and Juliet," the other two concerts being devoted to miscellaneous selections. To fitly celebrate the Society's majority, the services of the late Anton Seidl and his orchestra of forty-eight had been engaged to accompany the choral works and to give two orchestral concerts. The subscribers and the public generally were looking forward with great enthusiasm to the full enjoyment of these great works, when the Society's chorus would be supported by such a renowned orchestra, when, only a fortnight before the festival, the news of Mr. Seidl's awfully sudden death reached Montreal. Mr. Seidl was well known here, and the announcement of his death called forth the sincere grief of all lovers of true music in this city. For some time it was feared that the festival would have to be postponed, but Mr. Henry P. Schmidt, concert-master of the orchestra, took the baton. The appointment was a happy one, for Mr. Schmidt led his forces through the selections constituting the instrumental concerts with signal ability.

The chorus numbered 200, and, though smaller than in former years, the parts were more equally balanced, and it is not too much to say that its work was in all respects worthy of the great occasion. Madame Sapio had a favourable opportunity in the rôle of Juliet to exhibit her grand voice, and she fairly electrified her audience in the Waltz Song. She was ably supported by Mr. George Leon Moore as Romeo, and Mrs. Helen Warren as Gertrude and Clemente Bologna as Friar Lawrence were very acceptable. Madame Rivé King was the pianist at the orchestral concerts, her principal effort being Rubinstein's Concerto in G minor, which she executed with great brilliancy.

Messrs. Percy Pitt and T. H. Frewin, two members of that band of earnest and gifted young composers who are working quietly but steadfastly and successfully to regain for England a foremost position in the world of creative art, gave a concert in the Queen's (Small) Hall on April 28. The most important novelty was a Violin and Pianoforte Sonata in G by Mr. Frewin, which was well played by the composer and Miss Adela Verne. This proved a little disappointing in that, by the side of much excellent music, often rising to moments of considerable exaltation and impressiveness, there were found passages where the composer's flight seemed to droop. Thus the opening theme of the first Allegro—a broad phrase of a heroic stamp—gathers strength and importance as the movement proceeds, and so long as the composer is thus in the 'Ercles vein we follow him with interest and enjoyment. It is in his quieter moods that he seems to need greater concentration and a more pronounced individuality. The Finale is a tuneful, flowing Rondo, in which the composer's excellent musicianship secures the requisite continuity and homogeneousness without effort. Mr. Frewin's other compositions were a Hungarian Rhapsody for the flute (played by Mr. Fransella) and a number of songs of a tuneful and popular kind. Mr. Pitt's contributions to the programme were three artistic pianoforte and two violoncello pieces, besides five songs. Of these we would single out for special mention a very fine setting of Verlaine's "Silence," a serious, noble song, extremely chromatic, but written in masterly style. A "Mélodie païenne" (words by Ch. Guérin) was equally good, though of a very different character, thus serving to display the gifted composer's versatility. Mr. Frewin played a number of violin solos, Mr. W. H. Squire was the violoncellist, and Miss Mabel Berrey and Mr. L. Frölich were the vocalists.

The Bermondsey Settlement Choral and Orchestral Union must be congratulated on the artistic success obtained by the introduction at the local Town Hall, on April 28, of such modern compositions as Sir Hubert Parry's "Blest Pair of Sirens," Dr. C. Villiers Stanford's "The Revenge," and Sir Frederick Bridge's "The Flag of England." These popular works were sufficiently contrasted, both in sentiment and in musical treatment, to evoke interest in each, and in every respect the result was highly satisfactory. The three compositions go well in one programme and make a good show of current British choral production. The orchestra and choir, totalling nearly 200, illustrated the dignity of Sir Hubert Parry's work quite as felicitously as they caught the patriotic fervour of the other two invigorating pieces. Evidently the performers enjoyed their grateful task as fully as did the listeners. Sir Frederick Bridge, who was enthusiastically received, conducted "The Flag of England," but the remaining pieces were given under the capable direction of Mr. John E. Borland. Vocal pieces were contributed by Miss Helen Jaxon, Miss Laura Pearson, and Mr. Robert Grice; and Miss Pattie Wildman played Sterndale Bennett's Pianoforte Concerto in F minor.

The Victoria Madrigal Society, in reproducing gems of part-music in which through successive ages England has been so rich, deserves hearty encouragement. At St. Martin's Town Hall, on the 13th ult., Dr. G. Stanley Murray again led his well-trained and zealous singers through a choice selection of old and comparatively new compositions instinct with ingenuity and taste. Notable examples of the earlier school were Morley's "Now is the month of Maying," Wilbye's "Flora gave me fairest flowers," and Weelkes's "As Vesta was," compositions affording a severe test of the capabilities of the executants. To each piece justice was done, the more intricate passages being firmly taken up and smoothly sung, while the indicated effects of light and shade were carefully observed. The nineteenth century was represented by Mendelssohn, Gaul, Leslie, Murray, and others, with dainty pieces, in the rendering of which conscientiousness was as apparent as musical efficiency. A "Scottish War Song," by Blanchard, was given with dash and impulse. Madame Lilla Harrison and Mr. A. H. Gee, with songs, and Miss H. Sarse, with pianoforte pieces, interspersed the part-music.

pianist from Boston, Mr. Edward Baxter Perry, who has achieved much fame in the States. Remarkable warmth and refinement, especially in the treatment of Chopin, have earned for Mr. Perry in his native country the title of "the poet among pianists." His accuracy, command of technique, delicate phrasing, and scholarly methods would be remarkable in any player. Dr. Campbell was Mr. Perry's first pianoforte teacher in Boston, thirty years ago. Later he studied with Kullak, Pruckner, Liszt, and Clara Schumann, and during the last ten years he has given about 1,300 recitals in the United States. At the special request of Mr. Perry, the choir of the Royal Normal College opened the recital with Benet's grand old madrigal "All people now are merry," written in honour of Queen Elizabeth.

MISS GWENDOLYN TOMS, Mr. Jasper Sutcliffe, and Mr. Arthur Williams commenced a series of three chamber concerts at the Queen's (Small) Hall on the 10th ult. The concerted pieces were Brahms's D minor Violin and Pianoforte Sonata (Op. 108) and the same master's B major Trio (Op. 8). Of the former placid work, a refined but somewhat too placid performance was given, so that the calm serenity of the music ran great risk of being mistaken for dulness. The trio suited the young artists much better, and their playing of this splendid work was thoroughly artistic and enjoyable. Miss Toms chose for her solos three studies (in thirds, sixths, and octaves) by Chopin, which she played with beautiful touch, great fluency, and delightful purity of style. Mr. Williams gave a fairly successful performance of a violoncello sonata by Locatelli, and Miss Maggie Purvis sang songs by Brahms and Liza Lehmann to the satisfaction of a portion of the audience.

THE West Hampstead Choral and Orchestral Society closed its seventh season, on the 4th ult., with a performance of Cowen's "St. John's Eve," at the West Hampstead Town Hall. The artists were Miss Emily Davies, Madame Marian McKenzie, Mr. Ager Grover, and Mr. Francis Harford. It was the most successful concert which has hitherto been given by this Society, the choruses being sung with excellent precision and attack, the more subdued numbers being rendered with much finish. The second part was miscellaneous, Madame McKenzie being very successful in Backer's "Lovely May," whilst Miss Adela Weekes obtained an encore for a clever recitation of Dickens's "Miss Pecksniff's Conquest." Mr. W. N. Barron proved an efficient accompanist, and Mr. Edward G. Croager contributed a pianoforte solo in addition to his duties as conductor.

MR. A. R. MUSGRAVE was again enabled to turn his choral society to account by reviving Cowen's early cantata "The Rose Maiden," at a concert at the Steinway Hall, on the 2nd ult. On the whole, the chorus, numbering about a hundred, sang creditably, bringing out most of the points of the melodious composition. They were specially successful in the animated number "'Tis thy wedding morn." For the accompaniments there was a small force of strings and wood, together with a pianoforte and organ. Miss Edith Serpell gave the soprano solos with taste and judgment. Madame Belle Cole's assistance was of the utmost value, and thorough fitness for the duties assigned to them was displayed by Messrs. Mandeno Jackson and Arthur Barry. Mr. Musgrave conducted with skill and energy.

A BRILLIANT performance, partaking of a festival nature, of Sterndale Bennett's "May Queen" was given at the Alexandra Palace on Saturday afternoon, April 30, the soloists being Madame Lilla Harrison, Miss Maud Baker, Mr. Harry Stubbs, and Mr. R. E. Miles, all of whose efforts met with very cordial appreciation. The freshness and beauty of the work were greatly appreciated by an immense audience, several of the numbers being redemanded. The choruses were finely sung by the Alexandra Palace Choral Society, a splendid body of voices, numbering about a thousand, equally good in attack and in quality of tone, and gathered together and trained by Mr. Henry J. Baker, who ably conducted. Mr. Alexander Griffin rendered valuable assistance at the organ.

THE performances in connection with the musical festival of the Lower Rhine, taking place this year at Cologne during Whitsuntide (29th to 31st ult.), included on the first day: Double chorus "Nun ist das Heil" (S. Bach), Seventh Symphony (Beethoven), and Handel's "Deborah" (Chrysander edition). On the second day: Ninety-eighth Psalm (Mendelssohn), C major Symphony (Schubert), and Berlioz's "Faust." On the final day: Brahms's "Schicksalslied"; Overtures, "Die Meistersinger" and "Oberon," Richard Strauss's "Eulenspiegel," excerpts from "Götterdämmerung," the Finale from "Fidelio," and the customary vocal and instrumental solos. Professor Wüllner, of Cologne, was the principal conductor.

THE South Hampstead Orchestra held its thirteenth annual concert on the 24th ult., at St. James's Hall. Tschaïkowsky's Fifth Symphony severely tested the efficiency of the players, but with the exception of occasional hesitancy of attack and an awkward slip among the violins in the final movement, the performance was free from serious fault. Both the second and third sections—respectively the Andante and the Valse—were rendered with notable delicacy and point. Mr. A. J. Slocombe's execution of the solo part of Brahms's Violin Concerto was marked by facility and judgment. The vocalist was Miss Beatrice Spencer, who sang in finished style Mozart's aria "Zeffiretti lusinghieri." Mrs. Julian Marshall again displayed decision and rare intelligence as conductor, and the lighter string departments consisted almost entirely of ladies.

MR. ALBERT W. KETÈLBEY, of Trinity College, London, gave a recital of his own compositions, on the 23rd ult., in the Lecture-room of the Institution. The most important work was a Quintet for oboe, clarinet, bassoon, horn, and pianoforte, which gained the Michael Costa Prize—a spirited production, combining freshness of manner with ingenuity of workmanship. Ability in writing for other instruments was evinced in a couple of violin pieces (given by Mr. C. Auguste Victor) and in two flute solos (executed by Mr. Albert Fransella). Of the songs in various styles—interpreted by Madame Rina Robinson, Mr. Harry Fairleigh, and Signor Giuseppe Villa—a bold setting of "Blow, blow, thou wintry wind," was specially successful.

THE St. Cuthbert's Hall Choral Society, Earl's Court, now in its second season, is developing into a most efficient choral body, under the able conductorship of Mr. Cyril Miller, organist of St. John the Baptist, Kensington. This was proved by an excellent performance, at its second concert of the season, on the 24th ult., of Handel's Sixth Chandos Anthem and of Mr. C. H. Lloyd's cantata "Hero and Leander," with Madame Ada Patterson and Mr. Charles Phillips in the solo parts. The performances also included a very effective rendering of William Wallace's set of five "Spanish Songs" and some clever violoncello interpretations of Mr. Sydney Brooks. The hall was well filled by an appreciative audience.

THE Lyndhurst Road Church Choir, Hampstead, gave a successful evening concert at the Vestry Hall, on the 4th ult., at which the chief feature was an excellent performance of Sterndale Bennett's "May Queen." The soloists were Miss Stanley Lucas, Miss Helen Saunders, Mr. Reynolds Wood, and Mr. Edgar Archer. Miss Ellen Bowick gave a recitation with acceptance, and Miss Ella Macey efficiently discharged the arduous duties of accompanist. Mr. J. Douglas Macey, organist of the church, conducted.

Two new books are announced in connection with the approaching performances of Wagner's "Ring" at Covent Garden. One is a description of the great drama by Mr. R. Farquharson Sharp, with illustrations by Mr. Reginald Savage; the other is a large folio volume entitled "Stage Construction," by Mr. Edwin O. Sachs, an architect who has given special attention to the important subjects of scenic art and stage equipment. Messrs. Marshall Russell and Co. and Mr. B. T. Batsford are the respective publishers

MR. THEODORE WERNER'S second historical violin recital at Steinway Hall, on the 9th ult., was not less interesting than its predecessor. Beginning with Leclair, he played examples of several composers with facility, abundant spirit, and excellently graduated feeling. Mr. Werner's performance of the first movement of Viotti's Concerto in A minor and of Ernst's "Elégie" proved specially worthy of approval. Songs, both ancient and modern, were pleasingly rendered by Mdlle. Eva Cortesi, and Mr. Ernest Walker presided at the pianoforte.

THE Leytonstone Choral Society gave the last concert of its sixteenth season on April 25, when the programme included Mendelssohn's "Hear my Prayer" and "Judge me, O God." Miss Jessie Hotine and Mr. Glaysher contributed several songs, violoncello solos were played by Miss E. Uhlhorn-Zillhardt, and Mr. C. May proved an efficient accompanist. Mr. J. W. Ullyett, the conductor, was presented with a drawing-room clock in recognition of his services since the choir was organised in 1882.

THE Parepa-Rosa Scholarship at the Royal Academy of Music has been awarded to Gertrude Lydia Harvey (of Ashburton). The examiners highly commended Fanny Elizabeth Chetham and commended Ethel Roberts, Mary Isabel Reamy, Kate Thorpe Pidduck, and Ethel Elizabeth Bird. The Sterndale Bennett Scholarship has been awarded to Felix Gerald Swinstead (of London). The examiners highly commended Stephen Champ and commended Gerald F. Kahn and Sidney A. Freedman.

THE Temperance Choral Society celebrated its coming of age by holding a re-union at St. Dunstan's Schools, Fleet Street, on the 16th ult. Founded twenty-one years ago by the late Mr. James A. Birch, Gentleman of the Chapel Royal, the Society did excellent work under his genial and efficient conductorship, and, guided by its present able conductor, Mr. Frederick Williams, there is no reason why it should not continue to flourish and attain to a green old age.

THE number of candidates for Trinity College London Local Examinations in Musical Knowledge (Theory), taking place on the 4th inst., at Centres in Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, India, and Canada, is 3,964, being the largest number of candidates ever presented by the Colonies, and an increase of 445 on the number entered in 1897. Mr. George E. Bambridge has been appointed examiner for the College in South Africa this year in practical subjects.

A "MUSICIANS' Prayer Union" has recently been formed. The object of the Society, as stated in the rules, is "to place every branch of our profession on the highest level—(a) by banding together the members of the profession in bonds of Christian brotherhood, and (b) by upholding each other at the Throne of Grace." The honorary secretary of the Union is Mr. Livesey Carrott, 37, Cambridge Gardens, Bayswater, who will furnish all information.

THE first of the present season's "Queen Victoria" lectures was delivered at Trinity College, by Mr. Edgar F. Jacques, on the 24th ult. (too late for detailed notice in this issue). His subject was "The Psychology of Musical Appreciation," and in this lecture he dealt with music in its sensuous and intellectual aspects, reserving for his second lecture (which was to take place on the 31st) a consideration of the art from emotional and dramatic points of view.

THE Kyrle Choir, under the direction of Mr. F. A. W. Docker, gave a performance of "Elijah," on the 11th ult., in St. Augustine's, Bermondsey. The soloists were Miss A. Wilmot-Briggs, Miss Marion Arbu, Mr. Ager Grover, and Mr. Robert Grier. The "Creation" was given by the Choir on the 18th ult. The soloists were Miss Cecilia Gray, Mr. John Probert, and Mr. Arthur Walenn. Dr. E. H. Turpin accompanied on the organ.

A FAREWELL dinner was given to Mr. Fred. Bevan, a Gentleman of the Chapel Royal and composer of several popular songs, at the St. James's Restaurant, on April 25. Mr. Bevan has accepted the important appointment of professor of singing at the "Elder" Conservatorium of Music in the University of Adelaide, and his many friends in London will wish him a hearty "God speed" in his new sphere of work.

THE St. Saviour's Choral Society, Forest Gate, which only came into existence last autumn, gave its second concert, at the Emmanuel Institute, on the 10th ult., when very creditable performances of Macfarren's "May Day" and Mendelssohn's "Hear my Prayer" were the chief features of the evening. Mr. Arthur P. Lidbury accompanied, and Mr. John Lishman conducted.

MR. J. H. MAUNDER'S cantata for male voices, "The Martyrs," was performed by the Civil Service Vocal Union, at Cannon Street Hotel, on April 28, under the direction of the composer. The dramatic choruses were sung with great vigour by the choir, and Mr. Watkin Mills was most successful in the baritone part. Mr. Arthur Payne led the orchestra.

MRS. TOBIAS MATTHAY gave her first dramatic recital at the Salle Erard, on the 4th ult., with distinct success. A special feature of the programme was Mrs. Matthay's excellent rendering of Grieg's "Bergliot," accompanied on the pianoforte by Mr. E. Cuthbert Nunn. Miss Gertrude Peppercorn contributed some Chopin pieces with her usual charm.

AMONGST recitals worthy of note during the past month should be mentioned those given by the clever young violinist, Mr. Aldo Antonietti, Miss Adela Verne, Miss Hirschfeld, the Signorine Cerasoli, and Mr. Otto Hegner, the last-named, a prodigy in 1888, when he first appeared in London at the age of twelve, being now entitled to be ranked as one of the artistic pianists of to-day.

PROFESSOR NIECKS, of Edinburgh, the biographer of Chopin, has in preparation a life of Robert Schumann. He will have access to some of the papers and correspondence of the late Madame Schumann for the record which he proposes to write of her husband.

A NOVEL feature at the concert recital announced by Mr. Francella, the popular flautist, for the 6th inst., at the Queen's (Small) Hall, will be the introduction of a flute quartet, consisting of four differently tuned instruments—viz., F flute, concert flute, tenor flute, and bass flute.

THE committee of the Gloucester Festival have arranged with Signor Verdi and Messrs. Ricordi, his publishers, for the first English performance of the "Stabat Mater," "Laudi alla Vergine Maria," and "Te Deum," recently produced in Paris.

HANDEL'S "Messiah" is to be performed shortly by the Museum Choral Society in Frankfort, under Dr. Chrysander's superintendence, as nearly as may be in accordance with the practice in Handel's own time.

MR. H. W. RENDELL, organist and choirmaster of the Parish Church, Wood Green, gave an organ recital on the grand organ at the Crystal Palace on the 14th ult.

THE Princess of Wales has been graciously pleased to become patron of the Leeds College of Music, conducted by Messrs. Edgar and G. Percy Haddock.

FOREIGN NOTES.

AMSTERDAM.—The operatic season here came to a close, on the 1st ult., with the performance of August Enna's opera "Cleopatra." The work of the Danish composer has been the principal success of the season and has been performed twenty-five times during its course.

ANTWERP.—M. Peter Benoit has resigned his position of Director of the Conservatoire, in consequence of his disapproval of some new regulations introduced by the Government upon the recent conversion of the Conservatoire into a Royal Institution. M. Benoit, who is the leader of the modern Flemish school of composers, has been chiefly instrumental in raising the Antwerp Conservatoire to its present important position, and his retirement from the directorship is deeply regretted.

BERLIN.—The three-act romantic opera "Alar," libretto and music by Count Geza Zichy, was brought out at the Royal Opera, on the 3rd ult., under Dr. Muck's direction, and very favourably received. The libretto, as presented in a rather poor translation of the original Hungarian, is the weakest part of the work, while the melodiousness of the score and picturesque instrumentation are freely admitted by the press. M. Lassalle, the famous Paris baritone, appeared for the first time in the German capital last month, and gave a series of representations at the Royal Opera. His reception was a very flattering one, the part in which he was most admired being that of Mephisto in Gounod's "Faust." Herr Richard Strauss, of Munich, has been appointed to the conductorship at the Royal Opera vacated by Herr Weingartner. The engagement is for a period of ten years from November next.——The last concert of the season of the Royal Orchestra, under the direction of Herr Weingartner (who will continue to conduct these concerts in the future, while retaining his title of Royal Capellmeister), took place on April 22. The principal works in the programme were Schubert's B minor Symphony and Beethoven's Ninth, at the conclusion of which latter the conductor was cheered to the echo by a crowded audience. Highly appreciated also was the reading given here, last month, by Herr von Possart, the Intendant of the Munich opera, of Tennyson's "Enoch Arden," with the effective incidental and melo-dramatic music written for the poem by Herr Richard Strauss, and interpreted by the composer on the pianoforte. Verdi's new sacred compositions are shortly to be performed for the first time in Germany by the Philharmonic Choir, under Herr Siegfried Ochs's direction, together with a grand Mass by the late Anton Bruckner, which will likewise be heard for the first time on this occasion. The committee, formed for the purpose of erecting a monument to Wagner in this capital has just issued a general invitation for subscriptions. It is a most representative body, including ministers of State, financiers, and professional men of all classes, including, amongst musicians, Hermann Levi, Richard Strauss, Gustav Mahler, Schuch, Humperdinck, Johann Strauss (of Vienna), Dr. Kretzschmar, Professor Klindworth, and many others.

BRUSSELS.—Previous to the closing of its doors for the season, on the 1st ult., the Théâtre de la Monnaie gave an extra performance of "Lohengrin," with M. van Dyck in the title-part, in the presence of a closely packed audience. After the duet in the third act, Mdlle. Ganne, who sang Elsa, becoming indisposed and unable to continue, Mdlle. Bossy, who was the Ortrud, with rare versatility at once assumed the part of the rival heroine in addition to her own, and successfully maintained the tour de force during the rest of the performance. It was a development of the duplicity of the character of his Ortrud which even Wagner could not have foreseen.——The twenty-fifth anniversary of M. Joseph Dupont's conductorship of the Concerts Populaires was celebrated, on the 4th ult., by a special concert, at which an enormous and highly enthusiastic audience assisted. Madame Caron and M. van Dyck, who both had made their original first appearance in public at the Concerts Populaires, took part, the former in the first act of Gluck's "Alceste" and the latter in the third act of "Parsifal." M. Dupont, who conducted, was presented with a gold medal, struck for the occasion, on the part of the Municipality of Brussels, besides receiving numerous other substantial tokens of the esteem in which he is justly held.

CARLSRUHE.—Herr Felix Mottl has been offered the important post of conductor at the Royal Opera, Munich, in succession to Herr Richard Strauss, and it is said that he has accepted it. It is probable, however, that efforts will be made successfully, as on several previous occasions, to retain the services of the eminent conductor at the Court Theatre, with which Institution he has been associated for so many years.

DORTMUND.—The fifth Westphalian musical festival, held here under the direction of Herr Janssen, from the 15th to the 17th ult., included the performance of Brahms's "Triumphlied," Pianoforte Concerto in D, and the "Vier ernste Gesänge"; Richard Strauss's "Tod und Verklärung," Tschaikowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony, Haydn's "The Seasons," and Wagnerian excerpts. Madame Carrêno was the pianist, and Fräulein Wedekind, Herren Sommer and Perron, the solo vocalists. The festival was numerously attended.

DRESDEN.—Dr. Felix Draeseke, the well-known symphonic composer, has written a festival overture, in celebration of the jubilee of the King of Saxony, which has just been published as Op. 65 by Messrs. Breitkopf and Haertel, of Leipzig.

LEIPZIG.—An excellent performance of Handel's oratorio "Esther," for the first time here, was given on the 2nd ult., at the Stadt-Theater, by the Riedel Verein, under the direction of Dr. Goehler, who, with the choral forces under his command, entered into the task with enthusiasm. The principal solo parts were in the efficient hands of Frau Baumann, Fräulein Osborne, Herren Giessweln and Scheiper. "Deborah" and "Hercules" have already been given by the Riedel Verein under Dr. Kretzschmar, previous to his retirement from the conductorship of that famous Society.

MAGDEBURG.—A commemorative tablet has recently been placed at the house inhabited by Richard Wagner during his residence here while holding the conductorship at the Stadt-Theater.

MANNHEIM.—At a recent meeting of the Wagner Society here, Herr Felix Weingartner, the Berlin conductor, gave a first reading of the book of a new music-drama "Orestes," upon the musical rendering of which he is now engaged. The poem is a free adaptation, in rhythmic prose and incidental verse, of the drama of Æschylus, the chorus, as a matter of course, forming an important element. Herr Weingartner, who proved himself an excellent reciter, was greatly applauded, while a highly favourable opinion of the work was expressed by a critical audience.

MAYENCE.—A performance of Liszt's oratorio "Saint Elizabeth" was given on Good Friday last, by the "Liedertafel," under the direction of Herr Fritz Volbach. The work had been prepared with the utmost care, and was received on this occasion with marked favour by a large audience, whereas on its first production here, some eighteen years since (under the late F. Lux's zealous conductorship), it failed to arouse much interest.

MILAN.—The re-opening next season of the historical Theatre della Scala appears to be assured. The subvention withdrawn some time since from the theatre by the municipality is to be replaced by the issue, on the part of an influential syndicate, of 1,200 shares of 250 lire each, the greater part of which has already been subscribed for.

MUNICH.—Mozart's "Zauberflöte" has been added to the number of the master's operas produced here in recent years under the special superintendence of the Intendant of the Royal Opera, Herr von Possart, who has spared no pains to render them model performances, in absolute conformity with the original scores and with the intentions of the composer. Under these conditions, and with entirely new scenery, "Die Zauberflöte" was brought out on April 30, before a crowded audience, and continues to prove an enormous attraction. Herr Richard Strauss is the conductor, the veteran tenor, Vogl, is an excellent Tamino, and Mesdames Bianchi-Pollini, Schloss, and Borchers are the leading female vocalists. The next novelty to be produced at the Royal Theatre will be the opera "Zinnober," by Herr Siegmund von Hausegger.

VIENNA.—Verdi's "Aïda," newly mounted, has been revived with great success at the Imperial Opera, under Herr Mahler's direction. Herr Goldmark's new opera "Briseis" is now in course of preparation here.——At the Theater-an-der-Wien a new three-act operetta, entitled "Dreibund," by Eugen von Taund (the composer of "Der Wunderknabe"), was brought out on April 28 with considerable success and promises to have a long run. ——A new Square, adjoining the Favoritenstrasse has been named "Brahms Platz," and a commemorative tablet has been placed on the house, Carlsgasse, No. 4, where the master resided for a period of seventeen years.

OBITUARY.

THE death of JOSEPH ALFRED BARNETT, which, we regret to record, took place on April 29, has removed one of our oldest English musicians, as he would have completed his eighty-eighth year on the 15th inst. He was formerly well known as a professor of singing and the composer of several popular songs and duets. He likewise wrote several pieces for the Church, by which he will be, perhaps, most remembered. Amongst the latter may be mentioned an Offertoire, "Exaudi Deus," for tenor solo; an "Ave Maria," for quartet; and a "Domine salvam fac," for chorus and solo voices. They are much used in Catholic churches and are included in Messrs. Novello's collection of sacred music. When a boy he possessed a beautiful soprano voice, and was frequently engaged for operatic performances and concerts. As a composer he was, to a great extent, self-taught, and there is no doubt that, if he had had the advantages enjoyed by musical students of the present day, he would have attained to still greater things in composition. He was a younger brother of John Barnett, the composer of "The Mountain Sylph" and other operas, at whose house in Paris he made the acquaintance of such men as Thackeray, Douglas Jerrold, and other celebrities, with many of whom he remained on terms of intimate friendship. He married early in life Miss Emma Hudson, a pupil of Sterndale Bennett. They had several children, the eldest of whom is Mr. John Francis Barnett, composer of "The Ancient Mariner," and the youngest, Miss Emma Barnett, the pianist.

The death occurred, on April 23, of FREDERICK WILLIAM DAVIS, the trombone player and a member of the Concert Trombone Quartet. Mr. Davis, who was professor of the trombone at Trinity College, London, was from 1893-95 conductor of a military band connected with Broadwood's pianoforte manufactory. The deceased, who was connected with several of our leading orchestras, was greatly respected.

We regret to record the death of FREDERICK MEADOWS WHITE, Q.C., late Judge of the Clerkenwell Court, which took place at 42, Sussex Gardens, Hyde Park, on the 21st ult., at the age of sixty-eight. Judge Meadows White, who was a Director of the Royal Academy of Music and a member of the "Associated Board," was well known in musical circles as the husband of Alice Mary Smith, the composer of several important works, such as "Ode to the North-East Wind," "The Passions," &c., to whom he was married January 2, 1867. Mrs. Meadows White died December 4, 1884.

The distinguished composer, THEODORE GOUVY, died on April 27, at Leipzig, where he had resided for many years past, at the advanced age of seventy-nine. Born at a village near Saarbrücken in 1819, he was originally destined for a legal career, but subsequently devoted himself entirely to music, studying at the Paris Conservatoire and at Berlin, under Eckert, and soon making himself favourably known in Germany as a composer. Purity of style and delicacy of sentiment are the characteristic qualities of his many compositions, which met with equal appreciation in France and in Germany. Indeed, so highly was he esteemed in Paris, that on the death of Ambroise Thomas he was offered the post of director of the Conservatoire, which, however, failing health did not permit him to accept.

The death is announced, on the 15th ult., at San Francisco, of RÉMÉNYI, the celebrated Hungarian violin virtuoso, who expired on the stage of the Orpheus Theatre, where he was giving a performance. Edward Reményi (whose real name was Hoffmann) was known in almost every quarter of the globe, his restless spirit causing him again and again to undertake most extensive concert tours in distant parts, where his impulsive style and brilliant technique never failed to arouse the enthusiasm of his audience. He was born at Heves, in Hungary, in 1830, and at the age of twelve was a fellow pupil of Joachim under Boehm, in Vienna. In 1853 he became a member of the Weimar orchestra, then under Liszt's direction, and in the following year came to London, where for a short period he formed part of the Queen's private band. He played at the Crystal Palace in 1877 and was again heard in London in 1878, his last visit to the metropolis having occurred some five years ago.

DÉSIRÉ HEYNBERG, a violinist of considerable attainments and a most excellent teacher, died on April 25, at Liège, at the age of sixty-seven. He was for many years a professor of his instrument at the Liège Conservatoire, and among his pupils were quite a number of distinguished violinists of the day, including Rémy, Marsick, Joseph Debroux, and Eugène Ysaye.

"ST. MAGNUS."

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—Ignaz Heim's "Sammlungen von Volksgesängen," to which Mr. John E. West referred last month, most probably first appeared not earlier than 1860, or thereabouts. At all events, the eighteenth edition was issued in 1873, and the tenth was advertised in 1869 in another work by the same compiler. Thus, in any case, it is a recent publication compared with the third edition of Henry Playford's "Divine Companion," issued in 1709, in which the tune "St. Magnus" may be found.

The question, therefore, really resolves itself into this: Is Heim an authority on tune lore to such an extent that his description of "St. Magnus" as a folk-song is deserving of any consideration? I venture to think he is not. The fact of his attributing to Mendelssohn the tune known throughout the Fatherland in connection with the words "O Gott du frommer Gott"—

No. 52 in the "Sammlungen," a tune traced back so far as the "Meiningisches Gesangbuch" of 1693, is sufficient evidence that he is not even versed in the familiar chorale of his own country. Much less, therefore, can we regard him as an authority on a tune known all over England a century and a half before the appearance of his collection.

Since, however, the tune has come up for discussion, it may be well to refer to the fact that in Playford's "Divine Companion" (p. 93), "St. Magnus," as we know it, is not assigned to Jeremiah Clark, nor, indeed, to anyone at all. But earlier in the book (p. 16) the following tune appears, which is acknowledged to him:—

The identity of the first phrase with the opening phrase of "St. Magnus," and the general resemblance in outline—especially of harmony—perhaps indicate the reasons which led later compilers to attribute to Clark the version—if I may so describe it—on p. 93. The name "St. Magnus" seems to have been bestowed by Riley in his "Parochial Harmony," 1762.—Yours faithfully,

J. R. GRIFFITHS.

HANDEL'S "NISI DOMINUS."

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—In your review of Handel's "Nisi Dominus" you have the following: "The Gloria Patri for double chorus published by the German Handel Society, and issued by Messrs. Novello for performance at the Handel Festival of 1891." Permit me to say that the Gloria has not yet been published by the German Handel Society (it is true I have given Dr. Chrysander a copy of the MS.), and that Novello's edition for the Handel Festival was made by my permission from what was then the only copy in existence, and the treasured possession of

Yours truly,

WILLIAM H. CUMMINGS.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY AND COLONIAL NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

BASINGSTOKE.—The Choral Society concluded its ninth season by giving a "centenary" performance of the "Creation," on April 28. The solo vocalists were Miss Alice Simons, Mr. Harry Stubbs, and Mr. William Llewellyn. Mr. Chas. Griffiths led the orchestra and Mr. C. H. W. Hickin presided at the harmonium. Mr. H. E. Powell conducted a very efficient performance, the band and chorus mustering some 100 executants. Previous to the concert the conductor, Mr. H. E. Powell, was presented by the chorus with an illuminated address and silver-mounted ivory baton (made specially for the occasion) as an acknowledgment of his valued services to the Society from its foundation nine years ago.

BRIGHTON.—The Brighton Sacred Harmonic Society gave a performance of Mendelssohn's "St. Paul" at its concert at the Dome on the 12th ult. The chorus and orchestra gave every evidence of the careful training they had received from their indefatigable conductor, Mr. Robert Taylor. The soloists were Madame Zippora Monteith, Miss Janet Spicer, Mr. Edward Branscombe, and Mr. Frederick Ranalow, each of whom did full justice to the music entrusted to them.

COCKERMOUTH AND KESWICK.—On April 27, at the Drill Hall, Cockermouth, and on the 28th, in the Pavilion, Keswick, the combined Societies of these towns gave a very excellent performance of "The Messiah." The band and chorus numbered 230 performers. The principals were Madame Conway, Miss Jeannie Appleby, Mr. William Green, and Mr. Noah Johnson. The band, which was chiefly from Hallé's orchestra, was under the leadership of Mr. F. W. Schofield. Mr. P. T. Freeman conducted.

FENNY STRATFORD.—Two excellent performances of Handel's "Samson" were given by the members of the Musical Society, in the Town Hall, on the 4th and 5th ult., under the conductorship of Captain Levi. The vocalists were Miss Maggie Jaques, Mrs. Bailey, Mr. Hamlin-Crimp, and Mr. Heath. Mr. Chapman was the solo trumpet player and Mr. T. J. Henley led the orchestra.

HALIFAX (NOVA SCOTIA).—Mr. Frank Gatward, formerly organist and choirmaster of the Parish Church, Great Berkhampstead, Herts (1882-1893), and for the past five years of the Cathedral Church, Halifax, N.S., has accepted the offer of a similar position in the noted Church of Gethsemane, Minneapolis, U.S.A. His last important musical event at Halifax was the performance of Maunder's "Lenten Cantata," sung by the Cathedral choir. Mr. Gatward has left a good male choir at Halifax, which the clergy of the diocese consider to be one of the finest in Canada. A large three-manual organ was erected by Norman Bros. and Beard in the Cathedral in 1895, which was mainly due to Mr. Gatward's exertions.

HONITON.—The annual concerts of the Honiton Choral Society took place on April 28. The principal works performed were Mendelssohn's 13th Psalm and "Hear my Prayer" and Mr. F. Cunningham Woods's cantata "King Harold." The miscellaneous selections included Mackenzie's "Three Merry Dwarfs" and Garrett's "Good night, farewell." The soloists were Miss Laura Lyon, Mrs. Joel Baker, and Mr. J. Dean Trotter. The conductor of the Society, Mr. Edwin N. Tayler (of Exeter), is to be congratulated on the result of his training.

LINCOLN.—Two such characteristic works as Mendelssohn's "Walpurgis Night" and Brahms's "Song of Destiny" were the chief features of the fourth concert of the Lincoln Musical Society, given at the Drill Hall, on the 4th ult. The band and chorus numbered about 300 performers, and the principal vocalists were: Miss Florence Oliver, Mr. Hirwen Jones, and Mr. F. W. Shaw. Miss Maud McCarthy, the wonderful child violinist, played Max Bruch's Concerto in G minor with wonderful brilliancy. Bizet's Suite "L'Arlesienne" and Wagner's "Tannhäuser" Overture were well played by the band. Dr. G. J. Bennett conducted this interesting concert with marked ability and enthusiasm.

LOUTH.—A successful concert was given by the Choral Society, at the Town Hall, on the 5th ult. The band and chorus numbered about eighty performers. The first part of the programme was devoted to a performance of Stainer's "Daughter of Jairus." The principal vocalists were Madame Goodall, Mr. Fred. W. Norcup, and Mr. R. B. Appleby. Violin solos were contributed in the second part by Miss Constance Attiwell, and Mr. O. Menai Price, organist and choirmaster of the Parish Church, conducted.

MARLBOROUGH.—The annual concert of the Marlborough Choral Society was held on the 13th ult., when an excellent performance of Haydn's evergreen oratorio the "Creation" was performed. The soloists were Miss Lilian Foote, Mr. Edwin Attree, and Mr. Francis Harford, all of whom sang Haydn's grateful music with much acceptance. The orchestra, led by Miss Olive Bell, acquitted themselves with satisfaction, and efficient service was rendered by Miss Greenland at the pianoforte. Mr. W. S. Bambridge conducted a performance which reflected great credit upon himself and all concerned.

TEDDINGTON.—The Choral Society in connection with the Parish Church recently concluded its seventh season by a highly meritorious performance of Mendelssohn's "St. Paul." The principal soloists were Mrs. Davidson, Mrs. Watts, Mr. Henry Marriott, and Mr. J. Walcock. The accompaniments were provided by an efficient string orchestra, while Mr. J. M. Coward supplied the wind parts on a Mustel organ, and Mr. D. A. Fox, accompanist to the Society, presided at the pianoforte. The performance reflected great credit on Mr. Randulph Coward, the conductor.

WORCESTER.—A very remarkable and unusually interesting concert was given by the Worcestershire Philharmonic Society, at the Public Hall, on the 7th ult. In the first place, there was performed for the first time in England a cantata, entitled "Die Wallfahrt nach Kevlaar," by Engelbert Humperdinck. In the second place, a very novel idea was introduced into the programme. Probably with a view to familiarise the music in order that its hidden beauties might be the more fully revealed, the cantata was performed twice in the same afternoon. This dual presentation of Humperdinck's cantata was evidently greatly appreciated by the audience, who rewarded the efforts of the soloists, chorus, and orchestra with loud applause. The other specially interesting feature was the performance of a portion of Mr. Elgar's "King Olaf," conducted by the composer. The remaining numbers of this cosmopolitan and comprehensive "feast of music" included the chorus "Wach' auf!" from Wagner's "Die Meistersinger," Gounod's "Gallia," a selection (four instrumental movements and a chorus) from Gluck's "Iphigenia in Aulis," the March from Massenet's "Le Cid," Beethoven's "Egmont" Overture, Tschaïkowsky's "Elegie" for strings only, and "God save the Queen." The soloists were Madame Medora Henson and Mr. Edward Branscombe. Mr. Edward Elgar ably conducted an efficient chorus and orchestra, the latter including Mr. G. Robertson Sinclair as the player on the drums. The Worcestershire Philharmonic Society is new, and this was its initial concert. If it continues to give such attractive programmes it will claim an attention far above that generally bestowed on ordinary provincial societies. Mr. Elgar is to be sincerely congratulated.

WORTHING.—The concluding concert of the season of the Worthing Choral Society took place in the Theatre on April 27, when Gade's "Erl-King's Daughter" was admirably performed. The soloists were Miss Serpell, Miss Janet Spicer, and Mr. Ivor Foster. The orchestra and chorus, numbering about eighty-five performers, acquitted themselves with distinction, and their performances reflected great credit upon their able conductor, Mr. F. D. Carnell. The orchestral selections, which included Grieg's "Peer Gynt" Suite in the second part of the programme, were conducted by Dr. Sawyer. The programme contained a critical synopsis of Gade's cantata from the pen of the Society's conductor, which proved to be both useful and acceptable to the audience.

ORGAN APPOINTMENTS.—Mr. W. E. Kirby, Organist and Choirmaster to St. Martin's Church, Fenny Stratford.—Mr. Wilfrid E. Sanderson, Organist and Choirmaster to All Hallows' Church, Southwark.—Mr. W. C. Webb, Organist and Choirmaster to Downs Chapel, Clapton.—Mr. Frederick Gibson, Organist to Bainbridge Memorial Church, Heaton Road, Newcastle-on-Tyne.—Mr. George Langsford Loam, Organist and Choirmaster to St. Edmund's, Crickhowell.—Mr. J. W. Hankins, to St. Andrew's Episcopal Church, Callander, N.B.

PREFACE.

Mendelssohn composed his "Six Organ Sonatas" at the request of Messrs. Coventry and Hollier, Music Publishers (then carrying on business at 71, Dean Street, Soho), acting upon the initiative of some English organists who were familiar with his masterly performances on the organ in London and Birmingham. In a letter written to his publishers in London, and dated Frankfort, December 17, 1844, Mendelssohn says (in English): "I hope to send you soon the promised organ pieces. Nine are ready, but I want to have twelve before I make a parcel of them."

The two pieces forming the present publication have been selected from those that remained unpublished of the "parcel" referred to by Mendelssohn. They are now printed for the first time from the original manuscripts preserved in the Royal Library at Berlin.

In preparing these two pieces for publication, expression marks, metronomic rates, and stop registration have been suggested, there being no such directions in the original autographs.

A MODERN SCHOOL

FOR THE

VIOLIN

BY

AUGUST WILHELMJ

AND

JAMES BROWN

IN THREE SECTIONS.

SECTION I.—TECHNICAL PRACTICE
(IN SIX BOOKS).

SECTION II.—STUDIES.

Section I. deals exclusively with the important subject of Daily Technical Practice, and contains a sufficient supply of material for the gradual and steady development of fingering, bowing, intonation, the positions, &c. This Section is issued separately, in six Books, arranged in progressive order, and, incorporated therein (it may be added), will be found all the Scales, Arpeggi, &c., which are needed by Candidates entering for the Associated Board and other Examinations.

Section II. is formed of a series of original and selected Studies, in six Books. In point of difficulty the Books are carefully co-ordinated with the similarly numbered Books of Section I., and are intended to be used concurrently with them.

In close connection with "A Modern School for the Violin" it is furthermore intended by the authors to issue an extensive repertory of Pieces suitable for teaching, the majority of them selected from the works of acknowledged Masters, and all calculated to encourage the Student and to further the development of a good style. Each piece will be separate, with pianoforte accompaniment, and the violin parts will be furnished with complete marks for fingering, bowing, and expression.

SECTION I. BOOK I. NOW READY.

Price Two Shillings net.

London: NOVELLO AND COMPANY, Limited.

Now Ready. F'cap 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d., Post-free.

THE

RIGHTLY-PRODUCED VOICE

BY

E. DAVIDSON PALMER,

Mus. Bac., Oxon.

The fundamental error in the training of men's voices.—Falsetto: its true nature and how it may be transformed.—Secret of voice-production.—Speaking voice of manhood.—The adult male alto.—The author's own voice and vocal experience.—Unique experiments and startling results.—Important laryngoscopic revelation.—Chest register in women's and boys' voices.—Decay of voice in singers: its unsuspected cause.—Training of tenors.—The old masters and the use of head-voice, &c.

"Written in a convincing style and is decidedly interesting."—The Times. "A book which all singers would do well to read and think over."—Manchester Guardian.

IN

COMPOSED BY

MOZART.

EDITED, WITH MARKS OF EXPRESSION AND PHRASING,

BY

ALBERTO RANDEGGER.

PREFACE.

Mozart's keen appreciation of the subtleties of the words he set to music is often so evident that, without a thorough understanding of their significance, it would be impossible to sing the music—to the spirit of which the words are closely allied—in strict accordance with the composer's intention.

With a view to meeting this difficulty a special English version has been adapted, to express, as nearly as possible, the literal meaning of the original Italian text.

In these translations no attempt has been made at versification, and they do not claim any literary merit, but they may be used in singing the songs, if desired.

In any case they will prove valuable to singers who are not familiar with the Italian language.

The alterations, cadences, &c., added in small type over the original music, are used by many eminent artists. The Editor, however, does not hold himself responsible for them, and leaves their adoption or rejection to the taste and discretion of the singer.

A NEW EDITION OF

THE RUINS OF ATHENS

A CANTATA

L. VAN BEETHOVEN

THE ENGLISH WORDS WRITTEN AND ADAPTED BY

PAUL ENGLAND.

Price One Shilling and Sixpence.

Full Score and Orchestral Parts, for use with this Edition, may be had on hire from the Publishers.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

It has been changed into a cantata, with English words, written or adapted by Mr. Paul England, the object being to place Beethoven's music in the hands of our choral societies. . . . The result shows a purpose completely achieved, and Messrs. Novello may depend upon a good reward for their enterprise. Such is the beauty of the music—Greek-like in its simple outline—that the cantata will spread rapidly over the country, the more because so much of it is already well-known.

DAILY NEWS.

The chorus of Dervishes, sung by about 500 of the tenors and basses of the Royal Choir, was encored by acclamation; and if Sir Frederick had cared to accept it a similar fate might have befallen the Turkish March and the delicious Interlude. Even still better was the performance of the final chorus, with its curious reminiscences of Mozart and of the prison chorus in "Fidelio." Altogether the revival was a notable one.

DAILY CHRONICLE.

It was a treat to hear music at once so solid and so graceful. "The Ruins of Athens" is not to be ranked among Beethoven's highest achievements, though none but he could have made such effective use of the barbaric element in the chorus of Dervishes—a taking air, emphasised by the wildest accompaniment. . . . The quaint Turkish March and the chorus, with which the work reaches a majestic termination, were also warmly applauded, but nothing—not even the elegant march and chorus, "Twine ye the garlands"—told so well as the impulsive number for the Dervishes, which was rendered with appropriate vigour and energy. . . . As the work is now made suitable for the concert platform, it should be adopted by all choral societies anxious to include in their répertoires compositions of the highest class.

WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.

Considering the rubbishy character of the productions which so frequently secure the attention of local choirs, it is indeed astonishing that such a beautiful work as this of Beethoven should have been neglected so assiduously—though doubtless the absence hitherto of any decent arrangement of the work for this purpose has had something to do with the matter. With the preparation of such an arrangement as that used last night, however, this difficulty has been overcome, and it may be assumed that henceforward the work, which contains some of Beethoven's most graceful and spontaneous choral writing, will he heard more often.

ATHENÆUM.

It is needless to state that the music of "Die Ruinen von Athen" does not display Beethoven in a lofty mood, the master keeping in his lightest manner from the first bar to the last. Consequently there was no serious strain on the executants on Wednesday, and the choral numbers were rendered with power and spirit, the favourite Dervishes' chorus being, of course, encored.

String Parts (in the Press). Wind Parts and Full Score, MS.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

The story, which in some form or other has often been set to music, is a variant of that we find in Benedict's "Saint Cecilia," Sullivan's "Martyr of Antioch," &c., but it seems to be one which has interest for the public, and is not without inspiration for composers. Mr. Leoni, at any rate, has set to it strains which won over their first audience to warm demonstrations of sympathy. . . . Choral societies will find "The Gate of Life" most useful.

STANDARD.

It must be gladly conceded at once that the score shows the hand of a musician who can write with taste and freshness in feeling. The heathen choruses and dances in the first of the three brief parts, the hymn of the Christians, in which the French device of singing with closed lips is adopted, and the final scene of the martyrdom, display full knowledge of effect.

DAILY NEWS.

Comparatively simple and unsophisticated music of this sort, sometimes recalling Gounod, sometimes the Italians, but almost always melodious and pretty, would be far better suited to the country choirs, the more especially as it presents few difficulties and employs only three soloists.

MORNING POST.

There are some attractive numbers in Signor Leoni's score. The opening chorus and the dances that follow are bright and piquant. . . . The hymn sung in prison is pleasing, and the organ is effectively introduced at the close.

GLOBE.

The cantata is not very remarkable for originality of ideas or treatment, and seems better fitted for performance by country musical societies than by a leading London choir. . . . Its fluent writing and thorough knowledge of conventional orchestral devices are points which will probably recommend it to some amateurs, and the excellent way in which the choral numbers were sung by the choir proved that the music was thoroughly appreciated by the performers.

ST. JAMES'S GAZETTE.

Its music is light, bright, tuneful, and dramatic, with a certain resemblance to the writing of Mascagni, Puccini, and Leoncavallo.

ATHENÆUM.

The music is mainly in the modern Italian style as regards phrasing and orchestration, and is written in a manner that cannot fail to prove grateful to performers.

DAILY GRAPHIC.

The choir revelled in the music, which they sang with no less skill than enjoyment, and the vast majority of the audience applauded, wherever there was an opportunity to applaud, with the utmost enthusiasm. The reasons for this success are not far to seek. Mr. Leoni's melodies are of unimpeachable suavity, with the added attraction of possessing a strong family likeness to favourite numbers by a variety of popular composers, from Wagner to Mascagni.

PREFACE.

The words of these Four-and-Twenty little Songs have been selected from Mr. Norman Gale's delightful volume of Children's Poems. A few modifications of the original text have been made in order to facilitate their musical rendering.

Though in the first instance, no doubt, the songs will be mainly sung to children rather than by them, the Composer's aim has been to observe such conditions in his settings as to make it easy for children to join in singing them themselves. With this object he has endeavoured to furnish simple, rhythmical melodies of a suitable compass, and it will be found that in the case of sixteen out of the twenty-four songs the vocal range is confined to the octave, whilst in only three instances does it exceed nine notes.

POLYTECHNIC, REGENT ST., W.

PRESIDENT, MR. ALBERTO RANDEGGER.
PRINCIPAL, MR. JAMES BATES.

Twelve Solo Boys can be strongly recommended for Oratorios, Festival Services, Concerts, Organ Recitals, &c. The boys can be heard, by appointment, at their practising rooms, which are nearly opposite the Queen's Hall, Langham Place. For copies of recent testimonials, critiques, &c., address, Mr. JAMES BATES, Polytechnic, Regent Street, W. Telegrams: "Bates," Polytechnic, London.

MR. CHARLES KNOWLES
(YORKSHIRE BARITONE)
Of the Crystal Palace and principal Provincial Concerts.
"ST. PAUL."—WEDNESBURY CHORAL SOCIETY.—"In the title-rôle Mr. Charles Knowles made from first to last an excellent impression upon his listeners. The sympathetic rendering of the devotional air 'O God, have mercy,' and, in marked contrast, his splendid interpretation of the fiery 'Consume them all,' showed him to be a vocalist of very high merit. We shall hope to hear him again."—Wednesbury Herald, May 7, 1898.
"The success of the evening was centred in Mr. Charles Knowles, who, we believe, has never been heard in Wednesbury before, but who created an excellent impression some time ago at Walsall. He comes from Yorkshire and possesses all the manly actions and the vigorous style which characterise the Northerner, whilst his singing on this occasion was of high order, so much so that he aroused his audience from coldness to the highest enthusiasm. In the spirited parts he gave them with fine attack and in grand style, while in the subdued music he was equally successful, and showed that he was not without the spirit of an artist."—Midland Advertiser, May 7, 1898.
"FALKA."—GRAND THEATRE, LEEDS, Easter Week.—"With a good voice at his command Mr. Charles Knowles gave a fine portrayal of the bold and impetuous Boleslas, and his two chief songs were very effectively rendered."—Yorkshire Post, April 12, 1898.
"CREATION" AT ARMLEY.—"Mr. Knowles is the possessor of a magnificent voice, and what nature has done for him he has supplemented with a careful training, the result being most satisfactory."—Armley News, April 15, 1898.
GRAUN'S "PASSION" MUSIC, LEEDS.—"Mr. Charles Knowles was excellent in the bass solos and gave a particularly vigorous reading of the fine air 'As stands a lofty mountain.'"—Yorkshire Post, April 2, 1898.
"Whilst Mr. Charles Knowles gave a vigorous rendering of the fine, bold, and in its way dramatic solo, 'As stands a lofty mountain.'"—Leeds Mercury, April 2, 1898.
"CREATION."—TONG CHORAL SOCIETY.—"Mr. Knowles justified his engagement by a really admirable rendering of the solos allotted to him."—Bradford Observer, March 24, 1898.
"Mr. Charles Knowles sings with a good deal of dramatic power, and employs a capital voice with other evidences of technical accomplishment, and he was certainly not behind the others in the degree of favours won. His recitatives were very well sung indeed, and in the two airs which fall to the part, 'Rolling in foaming billows' and 'Now heaven in fullest glory,' he was accorded the heartiest plaudits."—Cleckheaton Guardian, March 25, 1898.
"JUDAS MACCABÆUS."—"The bass solos were given with admirable effect by Mr. Charles Knowles, who possesses a sonorous and well-trained voice. 'Arm, arm, ye brave,' was given with much spirit, and his vocal capacity was well exhibited in the somewhat florid passage 'The Lord worketh wonders.'"—Yorkshire Post, February 7, 1898.
BALLAD CONCERT AT WORCESTER.—"Mr. Charles Knowles has a bass voice of exceptional quality and purity of tone, and he no doubt was the star of the evening. He sang two solos, for both of which he was encored, Mendelssohn's 'I am a roamer' and Emanuel's 'The Desert.' In the latter song he fairly surpassed the highest expectation, and the audience followed with almost breathless interest the theme of the composition. For encores he gave 'The devout lover' and 'Father O'Flynn.'"—Worcestershire Advertiser, November 27, 1897.

UPON THE

VIRGIL PRACTICE CLAVIER

AND

VIRGIL CLAVIER METHOD.

UNQUALIFIED APPROVAL & ENDORSEMENT.

COMMITTEE:

Herr OTTO LESSMANN (Chairman).

Dr. JEDLICZKA. | Dr. KREBS.
Herr FELIX DREYSCHOCK. | Dr. BIE.
Herr PHILIP SCHARWENKA. | Professor C. LÜTSCHG.

"The Virgil Piano School has just completed a course of four months, in which a number of children have been taught strictly according to the principles of the Virgil School, under the control of a committee of experts. The Virgil Method aims at a complete separation of the technical training from the tuition of the purely musical element; on an extraordinarily ingeniously constructed toneless Clavier the technical exercises are performed. Should this principle at the first moment appear doubtful, all objections are victoriously crushed by the brilliant results which the Virgil Piano School showed in the examination. It was particularly astounding to witness how children, who had not touched a key before, and had only practised on the toneless keyboard for four months, now produced at once an unusually even touch on the sounding pianoforte keyboard."—Berliner Lokal-Anzeiger, June 27, 1898.

TESTIMONIAL FROM DR. PEACE, OF LIVERPOOL:—

"January 24, 1897.

"I have much pleasure in expressing my high opinion of the Organ you have erected in Trinity Presbyterian Church, Birkenhead. As regards its general quality of tone, the instrument possesses those characteristics which are always associated with high-class workmanship, whilst the mechanical part of it is everything that the most exacting could wish.

"So far as my experience with your work goes, I think it is decidedly one of the best instruments you have built, and I think the congregation has every reason to be congratulated on the possession of a really excellent specimen of genuine artistic Organ-building.

"Yours very truly,

"A. L. PEACE."

THE MUSICAL TIMES
AND SINGING-CLASS CIRCULAR.
JULY 1, 1898.

HUBERT PARRY.

SIXTY years ago the late Thomas Gambier Parry purchased the estate of Highnam Court, pleasantly situated about two miles from the city of Gloucester, on the high road to Ross. Mr. Gambier Parry, the father of the subject of this sketch, was a highly cultured country squire, and a man possessed of exceptional artistic gifts. Having built and endowed the beautiful church of Highnam, he, with his own hands, adorned its walls with frescoes of his own designing. In order to ensure their permanence, he employed a method to which he gave the name of the "spirit fresco process," a process subsequently adopted by Leighton at South Kensington and by Ford Madox Brown in the Town Hall of Manchester. But examples of his skill as a painter are by no means localised to his own village, of which he was the lord of the manor. Excellent specimens of his work (which was always personal) may be seen at Ely Cathedral—in the nave, lantern, and baptistery, and also, nearer his home, at Gloucester Cathedral. He was not only considered to be the chief authority on decorative painting, but he made a fine collection of Italian paintings and other works of art at Highnam Court. He was also very fond of music. The composer he chiefly worshipped was Mendelssohn; but he had a genuine appreciation of J. S. Bach. He used to say that when he went to heaven he hoped that all the music he should hear in that region would be by Mendelssohn! Mr. Gambier Parry married a daughter of Henry Fynes Clinton, the eminent chronologist, a great classical scholar, and the author of two monumental works, "Fasti Hellenici" and "Fasti Romani." Henry Fynes Clinton was, moreover, a remarkably industrious man. His extraordinary capacity for hard work has descended in full measure to his distinguished musical grandson. Therefore, taking into consideration the position and affluence of his father, Hubert Parry may be said to have been born with "a silver spoon in his mouth." But he would be the first to admit how much he is indebted to the high artistic temperament of his father, as well as to the fine literary gifts and ceaseless industry of his maternal grandfather, all of which he inherits in a marked degree. It is very rare that a musician enters the world under such favourable auspices. Mendelssohn supplies a parallel instance. Parry, like Mendelssohn, and to his honour be it said, has made a noble use of his splendid opportunities.

Charles Hubert Hastings Parry, the second son of Thomas Gambier Parry, was born at Bournemouth, on February 27, 1848. Mrs. Gambier Parry, who was very delicate, died ten days after the birth of her son. Thus Hubert Parry has never known the blessedness of a mother's love. His father shortly afterwards married again; and as the high-spirited and exuberant Master Hubert very soon developed those symptoms which characterise "a naughty boy," he was despatched, at the early age of seven years, to a private boarding school at Malvern. With the exception of his school holidays he could scarcely regard Highnam Court as a home till it came into his possession a few years ago upon the death of his step-mother. At Malvern he gave more attention to drawing than to music. His earliest attempts at composition were chants and hymn-tunes, written when he was about eight.

HOW NOT TO LEARN THE PIANOFORTE.

About the year 1860 he was transferred from Malvern to Twyford school, near Winchester, of which the head-master was the present Dean of Durham. "There was no piano in the school," says Sir Hubert, "but Dr. Kitchin, who was sympathetic to music, allowed strumming at certain rare hours on the cottage pianoforte in his drawing-room. I took pianoforte lessons from a parochial organist in the neighbourhood. He was the composer of a large quantity of parish anthems, and, by way of doing a little extra business, supplied them to me seriatim. He actually attempted to teach me the instrument by making me play the accompaniments to those anthems, which were a kind of feeble four-part harmony exercise." "Did you ever see such stuff?" Sir Hubert laughingly asks, as he hands us the bound volume of his earliest pieces of music. This collection made during his boyhood period is very interesting. It contains the first piece of music he ever bought—a twopenny copy of "Behold, and see," &c., from "The Messiah," which bears the inscription, "Portswood, 1858," when he was ten years old. He used to sing solos at the school concerts—e.g., Spohr's "Bird and the maiden," and the "Midsummer Night's Dream" music, &c.

From Twyford Hubert Parry had the opportunity of often going over to Winchester. Here he came into close contact with Samuel Sebastian Wesley, then organist of the Cathedral. Wesley, whom he had known while at Twyford through the Luards who lived in the Close, was amiably disposed towards young Parry. He allowed the boy to sit on the organ stool with him in the Cathedral.

Digitized by Google

"There I used to sit," recalls Sir Hubert, "while old Wesley, with his eyebrows raised and his chin sticking out, ruminated on the organ. He was awfully kind to me. A sympathetic under-master showed me the '48,' which very soon surpassed everything in my affections."

FLOREAT ETONA.

Twyford was exchanged for Eton about 1861. Here Parry soon made his mark as a musical prodigy. He was fortunate in having three schoolfellows, at least, with tastes in sympathy with his own—Le Marchant Gosselin (an excellent pianoforte player), Edward Hamilton, and Spencer Lyttelton. The first-named, now a K.C.M.G., is First Secretary to the British Legation in Paris; the second, a K.C.B., is Assistant-Secretary to the Treasury; and the Hon. Spencer Lyttelton, C.B., one of Mr. Gladstone's private secretaries, is on the Council of the Royal College of Music. But, as we shall presently see, music was not the ruling passion of Hubert Parry's Eton days. Up to this time he had attempted composition without any knowledge whatever of harmony. He persuaded his father to let him take some harmony lessons and got them from Sir George Elvey, organist of St. George's Chapel, Windsor. "I had some difficulty in persuading my father to allow these music lessons," observes Sir Hubert; "as he had the strong prejudice common in those days against anyone going in seriously for music. I used to write my exercises in school on the interleaved pages of my school books. But I was too fond of the open air when the sun was shining to sit indoors, even for music. I had a couple of lessons on the organ from John Foster. My pianoforte playing was allowed altogether to run wild. I had a lesson or two from the parish organist during the few weeks I was at home for the holidays.

The only music we used to hear at Eton was at St. George's Chapel on Sunday afternoons. I was permitted to sit in the organ loft. How magnificent we boys thought the organ! And there was Elvey—dear old boy—with his snuff-box, 'Wherewithal shall a young man,' and all that," adds Sir Hubert, as he delights to recall those sunny Eton days. The following extract from a letter written by Elvey to his pupil Parry, who had not been well, may find a place here. It is dated August 5, 1865:

. . . We are to have a Parish Choir meeting at Eton on Monday, and I shall have to accompany no end of Gregorian chants, which I detest. . . . In regard to your studies during the holidays. If you can find time for writing, compose another anthem, an organ fugue after the style of the one in E by Bach: *

Then write an air with var. for 4 violins, after the style of Haydn's "God preserve the Emperor," which I suppose you are acquainted with. Now I think I have given you enough to do (more than I should like myself), and the best advice I can give you now, is to refrain from writing altogether unless you are quite well.

Yours truly,
G. J. Elvey.

SCHOOL CONCERTS AT ETON.

There was no resident music-master at Eton at that time, but Mr. John Foster, now a well-known veteran in the art, went down from London once a week to teach instrumental music and to hold classes for "the practice of vocal concerted music." Mr. John Foster, who speaks with natural pride of the gifts he discerned in his youthful pupil, has kindly lent us some of the old programmes of the Eton College Musical Society, which he conducted, and of which C. H. H. Parry was the ruling spirit. From these programmes we find that Parry appeared as a composer, as a performer on the pianoforte and organ, and as a vocalist! His pianoforte solos included one by Meyerbeer and one by Stephen Heller. With Sir Edward Hamilton he played "a duet by Handel," which the Eton College Chronicle records as "Let their celestial chords unite," and a duet "composed (by Parry) for the occasion." At one concert he played two organ solos. Two anthems of his Eton days, and published by Messrs. Novello as far back as 1865, were duly performed, their titles being "Prevent us, O Lord," and "Blessed is he," dedicated to his father and Elvey, his master, respectively. A madrigal, "Fair Daffodils," and a part-song, "Take, O take those lips away," were also sung. Another product of the Eton days was his Te Deum and Benedictus in D, dedicated to Sir John Stainer.

* As written by Elvey.

HUBERT PARRY, A VOCALIST.

But in the eyes of the majority of his schoolfellows Parry achieved his greatest triumphs as a vocalist. His vocal répertoire at those Eton College concerts included Gounod's "Nazareth" ("that made a tremendous sensation," the singer tells us), "Pro peccatis," "O God, have mercy" ("St. Paul"), "The Bellringer," and "To Anthea." Another song was S. S. Wesley's fine setting of the words "When from the great Creator's hand," taken from an Ode entitled "Work," composed by Wesley in 1864. "I must have that sung at one of the College concerts," observes Sir Hubert, as he points out the excellences of the song. This Ode, with several of Elvey's and other anthems, songs, glees, &c., is in the volume, inscribed "Bound, Eton, Jan. 27, 66," already referred to. One song in Wesley's Ode has a characteristic annotation in the neat handwriting of Hubert Parry. It runs as follows: "Don't be alarmed, gentlemen. The alterations are only for F. Cecil Ricardo, Esq." One of the songs of his Eton days—"Why does azure deck the sky?" dedicated to F. C. Ricardo, now a Lieutenant-Colonel in the army—bears the following curious foot-note (printed): "This passage may be omitted if the performer is unable to stretch the chords." Parry's vocal powers were not confined to concerts within the College walls. In 1865 Sir Frederick Bridge was organist of Holy Trinity Church, Windsor, and, as such, he conducted a popular performance of Mendelssohn's "Elijah" in the Royal Borough. As the bass soloist failed to appear, Parry undertook the onerous part of the Prophet. Sir Frederick Bridge, in recalling the incident, says: "Parry took 'Is not His word' at a tremendous pace." We can well believe it.

MUS. BAC. AT EIGHTEEN.

The chief musical event of Parry's Eton days was the taking of his degree of Bachelor of Music at Oxford, when he was eighteen years of age, not fifteen, as is sometimes incorrectly stated. It was an unprecedented thing for a boy at Eton to take a musical degree. His examiners at Oxford were Sir Frederick Ouseley (Professor of Music), Dr. Corfe, and Sir John Stainer, then a young man of twenty-six. Sir John writes from Oxford: "When Parry came here as a lad from Eton to take his degree, we all thought him bright, intelligent, and talented." Sir Hubert says, however: "I can't think how it was that they passed me." His exercise, a setting of "O Lord, Thou hast cast us out," was published at the time with the following characteristic dedication: "To all music-loving Etonians, past and present, this Cantata is dedicated by a lover of the old school." The cantata was performed at the College a few days before Parry left Eton. It is interesting to record that, on this unique occasion, his master, "dear old Elvey," led the violins, and that Mr. (now Sir Frederick) Bridge presided at the harmonium, both playing under the baton of the youthful composer. In the Eton College Chronicle, which Sir Hubert has kindly placed at our disposal—a newspaper, by the way, edited by the boys themselves—the following words conclude a very gratifying notice of the performance:—

> We must also tender our best thanks to Mr. C. H. H. Parry himself, for the great honour he has conferred upon the School by obtaining his Musical Degree; and it is with the deepest regret that we have to announce his departure last Half from the School, and the loss the Musical Society has sustained in being deprived of so able and energetic a President.

HOMER AND FAGGING.

The Eton College Chronicle also gives some very interesting information about certain non-musical doings at Eton of the Director of the Royal College of Music. He was a member of the Eton Society, a debating society formed of the boys themselves, and we learn that—

> On Monday, May 14 [1866], Mr. Parry introduced the question—"Did Homer recite his poems or write them?" The House displayed an unexpected amount of interest in it, and showed that it can appreciate really philosophical and learned arguments. The votes were, that Homer wrote his poems (with Mr. Parry), 12; that he recited them (with Mr. Buckland), 14. Behind the chair, 1.

Again:—

> On Monday, July 16 [1866], Mr. Parry brought forward a home topic—"Is fagging a system beneficial to public schools?" As might have been expected, the members, from their own experience, were of one mind in appreciating the system.

FOOTBALL.

Football! yes, Parry was as keen an enthusiast in the game as he was in his musical studies—perhaps more so. "I love the open air," he says, as he looks out of his study window on this bright sunshiny June morning, with an evident longing to be off for a spin on his bicycle, or to go for a breezy sail in his yacht. Here are some extracts from the invaluable Eton College Chronicle relating to the last football match in which Parry, as an Oppidan, played at Eton on St. Andrew's Day, 1866:—

COLLEGERS v. OPPIDANS.

> . . . We must imagine Chapel over, and the ropes lined three deep with the friends of both parties. . . . College won the toss and chose to kick to the tree calx. . . . College seconds sent the ball through to Parry, who placed it cleverly over the bully, and some three yards over the ground line of calx, amidst tremendous applause. . . . Freeth charged Parry, who made a most beautiful kick out, half way to tree calx, amidst shouts from the Oppidans. . . . College Walls playing very well worked the bully down; there was a splendid loose bully, put an end to by a "full pitch," kicked finely by Parry towards calx.

OXFORD.

In January, 1867, Hubert Parry went up to Oxford and entered Exeter College. At that time there were several public school men in the College, with the result that sport prevailed and the Exeter boat was near the head of the river. "I took to games and out-door exercises," says

Sir Hubert, "to the neglect of my studies; and I went on messing about on the pianoforte and organ without any guidance whatever." At that time Sir John Stainer was conductor of the Exeter College Musical Society, and he records that "Parry played occasionally pianoforte solos and accompanied songs and other things admirably." For one of the concerts Sir John adapted Schumann's cantata "The Luck of Edenhall" to English words, and conducted the first performance of that work in England. "Parry played the accompaniments, of course, excellently." Parry was one of the chief initiators of the "Oxford University Musical Club," which still flourishes. The meeting to form the Club was held in his rooms. Mr. Frank Pownall, the Registrar of the Royal College of Music and the possessor of a remarkably fine baritone voice, was a fellow collegian with Sir Hubert at Oxford in the late sixties. He describes his friend Parry in the following words:—

"Parry was one of the best known and most popular men of his time, both in his own college and throughout the University. Keen in outdoor sports, both cricket (being captain of the eleven) and football; president of the College Wine Club; delighting his friends with his pianoforte playing, especially when he could be induced to play an extempore fantasia on the latest music-hall ditty of the day; generally overflowing with animal spirits; a favourite with his fellow undergraduates because they admired his genius and still more appreciated his joyous good nature and his readiness to join and take the lead in any boyish escapade, particularly if it afforded an opportunity for making much noise; a favourite with the College authorities, because they recognised the wholesome influence exercised on the social life of the college by one in whom the spirits of the public school boy were combined with artistic genius and with pure and lofty ideals. Even in those early days he entertained the same strong dislike to mere conventionalities, whether of thought or action, and the same keen desire to get to the ground-truth of things which have been marked features in his character through life. Then, as ever, he was a voracious reader; nor were his special studies for the schools neglected, though his place in the Honours List (2nd Class in Law and History) was perhaps hardly a true measure of his intellectual capacity. He took his B.A. degree in 1870."

OUSELEY AND FIFTHS.

Sir Hubert tells a good story of Ouseley. One day Parry, in a fit of unusual merriment, deliberately played a succession of perfect fifths on the organ in the hearing of the Professor of Music. He was promptly called upon to desist. But he had his revenge. Twenty years afterwards he was acting with Ouseley at the University in a certain official capacity, not unconnected with the discovery of perfect fifths in certain musical compositions. In an interval of waiting, Ouseley employed his spare moments by writing a two-part Canon in the ninth. When he had finished it he passed the MS. to Parry, saying "here you are," or something to that effect. Parry quickly discovered two bare fifths in this two-part composition. When he called Ouseley's attention to them, the Professor said "Dear me, did I write those?" at the same time scrunching up the paper and throwing it on the floor.

PIERSON. STERNDALE BENNETT. MACFARREN.

During one long vacation, Hubert Parry persuaded his father to allow him to study for a couple of months with H. H. Pierson at Stuttgart. "Pierson," recalls Sir Hubert, "was a great worshipper of opera. He chiefly occupied the time of my lessons by trying to disabuse me of Bach and Mendelssohn. I also took some lessons from Sterndale Bennett, who was extremely kind and sympathetic, but he was too sensitive ever to criticise." It is interesting to note that the Director of the Royal College of Music was a pupil of two successive Principals of the Royal Academy of Music—Sterndale Bennett and G. A. Macfarren. Sir Hubert tells the following story of Macfarren. One day the Professor objected to some harmonic progression of his gifted pupil. Parry, nothing daunted, set to work and discovered no less than twenty-six examples of a similar progression in the works of Mozart. These he took to the Professor at the next lesson, and when he had played about twenty of them Macfarren gave in, but not without a further protest. There was, indeed, a good deal of amicable difference of opinion at the lessons, but their fruitfulness and the thoroughness of the teaching earned the pupil's lasting gratitude.

Macfarren, whose strong distaste for Wagner was well known, showed his disapproval of Parry's Wagnerian tendencies in the following extract from a letter he wrote to him, dated August 12, 1876:—

> I am sorry you are going to Bayreuth, for every presence there gives countenance to the monstrous self-inflation. The principle of the thing is bad, the means for its realisation preposterous. An earthquake would be good that would swallow up the spot and everybody on it, so I wish you were away.—Yours, with kindest regards,

IN THE CITY.

Having taken his degree and left Oxford, Hubert Parry sought a sphere of work. He naturally desired to devote himself entirely to music, but his father would not hear of it. The paternal dictum prevailed, and in 1871 Sir Hubert, with a partner, entered Lloyd's. "For about three years," he says, "I sat on a stool in a top-storey office with garret windows looking down on a back-yard off Broad Street, posting up thousands and thousands of entries in the ledgers. It was very quiet working at book-keeping up there, and I rather liked it. But it was an awful time for the shipping business. Millions of money 'went to the bottom' at that time. Having lost all our capital we shut up shop, and I turned to music." Subsequent events have proved the wisdom of that policy.

A POET.

It may not be generally known that Sir Hubert Parry has appeared in print as a poet. In Macmillan's Magazine for May, 1875, there is a song cycle, in six sections, by him, entitled "A sequence of analogies." Here is a specimen stanza:

> The songs that the skylark singeth
> When no one is nigh to hear
> Are not lost as she heavenwards wingeth,
> Though heard by no mortal ear.
> The Spirit of Music has stayed them
> As they fled on the wings of the breeze,
> And among her best treasures has laid them
> With stream-songs and sighs of the trees.

A SIDE-LIGHT—MR. DANNREUTHER.

Of the various masters under whom Sir Hubert has studied music, Mr. Dannreuther has excelled them all. Parry speaks of him in terms of genuine appreciation. "I owe a tremendous deal to Dannreuther," he says, "especially in composition, though he never gave me actual lessons in that." But it may not be without interest to record, as received from his own lips, a few of Mr. Dannreuther's impressions and recollections of his old and dear friend and former pupil.

"Parry," says Mr. Dannreuther, "has the quickest brain I have ever met with. It works with lightning rapidity. He can do two or three things at the same time. His mental horizon is as vast as is the keenness of his intellect. He grasps a thing at once. It becomes imprinted on his brain in a moment and remains there. All his music is conceived in this way. The complete design of the composition is fixed in his mind before he puts anything on paper. In this respect he resembles J. S. Bach and Wagner. For him to do anything slowly is out of the question. He writes rapidly; but, be it observed, he revises with the utmost care. I have seen in manuscript nearly everything he has composed. I was glad to give him that ready encouragement and personal sympathy which he seemed to need. He used to come to my house every Sunday afternoon at two, and stay till four or five—the happiest hours of my life. He met Wagner there, and was one of the small circle of friends who heard him read his "Parsifal" in manuscript, on May 17, 1877.

"From 1872 I gave Sir Hubert pianoforte lessons for several, I believe seven years. We worked right through Beethoven—not exclusively from a technical standpoint, but rather more as an intellectual study in music. He can play an Adagio of Beethoven's very beautifully, his accent is so good and true. As you may imagine, he came to grief now and then in the allegros, when his impetuosity literally outran his technical facility. It was my great pleasure and privilege to introduce all Parry's chamber music at the private concerts I gave in my former house in Orme Square. I also played many works in public whenever I got a chance, such, for instance, as the fine Pianoforte Concerto in F sharp minor (Crystal Palace and Richter concerts, 1880), as you will see from this book of old programmes.

"Some of his best works are still in manuscript and are only waiting for the necessary revision which he considers to be a sine quâ non prefatory to their publication. Whenever he wants anything from me he thinks nothing of flying over here on his bicycle, and if it were possible I believe that he would ride upstairs right into this room!" Mr. Dannreuther incidentally relates an amusing anecdote of his old pupil's impetuosity. "Once, when calling to see Grove at Macmillan's, he rushed into the Bedford Street shop, shouting, 'Is Mr. Gage disengroved?'"

CONCERT-GIVING AT CANNES.

In January and February, 1877, Sir Hubert, in conjunction with M. Guerini, gave "Six séances de Musique Classique et Moderne" at Cannes. The programmes included works by Brahms, Beethoven, Rubinstein, Raff, and others, also Parry's "Suite for pianoforte and violin." "M. Parry" played Beethoven's Pianoforte Sonata (Op. 90) and solos by Bach, Mozart, and Schubert. "The Bach Sonata for pianoforte and violin which we played," remarks Sir Hubert, "was a little too much for the French people."

FESTIVAL WORKS.

Once having entered the profession of music, Parry worked at white-heat enthusiasm in order to make up for lost time in his early training. He speedily attained a position in the front rank of English composers. At the Gloucester Festival of 1868 an "Intermezzo Religioso" for strings, composed by him in his Eton days, found a place. He was then a youth of twenty and spoken of by the London critics as "a son of Mr. Gambier Parry." But twelve years later—at the Gloucester Festival of 1880—the composer of "Prometheus Unbound" was a man to be reckoned with. Since then, Festival productions have come from his pen with almost annual regularity. The following table of such works tells its own tale:—

1880.	Gloucester.	"Prometheus Unbound."
1882.	Birmingham.	Symphony, No. 1, in G.
1883.	Gloucester.	"The glories of our blood and state."
1886.	Gloucester.	Suite Moderne, A minor.
1888.	Birmingham.	"Judith."
1889.	Leeds.	"Ode on St. Cecilia's Day."
1890.	Norwich.	"L'Allegro ed il Pensieroso."
1891.	Hereford.	"De Profundis" (Ps. 130), for soprano solo, three choirs, and orchestra.

1892.	Gloucester.	"Job."
1893.	Worcester.	Symphonic Overture, "To an unwritten tragedy."
1894.	Birmingham.	"King Saul."
1895.	Leeds.	"Invocation to Music" (in honour of Purcell).
1897.	Hereford.	Magnificat (Latin words).
1898.	Gloucester.	(Choral work in preparation.)

To the above remarkable output must be added "Blest Pair of Sirens" (Bach Choir, 1887), the Choric song from Tennyson's "The Lotos Eaters" (Cambridge, 1892), and "Eton," an Ode by Algernon Charles Swinburne, set to music for the 450th anniversary of the foundation of the College (1891), both the poem and the music being by old Eton boys. Special mention must be made of the music to Aristophanes's "Birds" (Cambridge, 1883) and "Frogs" (Oxford, 1892).

"Judith," Sir Hubert's first oratorio, of which he wrote both words and music, was composed against time, in eight months. For two months he wrote regularly eight pages per diem. An admirable article on "Judith," contributed by his friend Professor Villiers Stanford to the Fortnightly Review of October, 1888, has the following fine peroration: "Such a work is an encouragement to Mr. Parry's successors, a source of pride to his contemporaries, and a tribute to his predecessors. It is the offspring not only of a finished musician, but of a cultivated thinker. For such a possession art is the better and England the richer."

It must not, however, be supposed that so intellectual and great a composer as Sir Hubert Parry is not capable of a dash of humour when it suits his purpose. There is a capital specimen of it in his "Characteristic popular tunes of the British Isles"—two books of pianoforte duets dedicated to his two children, "Dolly" and "Gwen." In the arrangement of "Three blind mice," while the treble performer is steadily playing "See how they run," the manipulator of the bass part has a rapid figure of an exceedingly scampering nature. The "Frogs" (a favourite work of the composer's) abounds in musical witticisms as subtle in their cleverness as they are intensely droll—in fact, it is a veritable Parryphernalia of fun.

The following is an attempt at a complete list of Sir Hubert Parry's published compositions and works that have been performed in public:—

Oratorios, &c.—"O Lord, Thou hast cast us out" (for Mus.B. degree, 1866); "Prometheus Unbound" (1880); "The glories of our blood and state" (1883); "Blest Pair of Sirens" (1887); "Judith" (1888); "Ode to St. Cecilia's Day" (1889); "L'Allegro ed il Pensieroso" (1890); "Eton" and "De Profundis" (1891); Choric song "The Lotos Eaters" and "Job" (1892); "King Saul" (1894); "Invocation to Music" (1895); Music to Aristophanes's "Birds" (1883) and "Frogs" (1892) and to "Hypatia" (1893).

Orchestral.—Symphonies, No. 1, in G (1882); No. 2, in F (1883); No. 3, in C (1889), and No. 4, in E minor (1889); Suite Moderne in A minor (1886); Overture, "Guillem de Cabestanh" (1879); Symphonic Overture "To an unwritten tragedy" (1893); Suite for strings (1894); Symphonic Variations in E minor (1897).

Chamber Music.—Quintet in E flat; Quartets in F minor (strings) and A flat (pianoforte and strings); Trios (pianoforte and strings), in E minor, B minor, and G; Sonata in A (pianoforte and violoncello); Fantaisie Sonata in B, Sonata in D, and Partita in D minor (violin and pianoforte); Twelve short pieces for violin and pianoforte (in 3 books).

Pianoforte.—Pianoforte Concerto in F sharp minor (1880); Duo in E minor (two pianofortes); Sonatas in F and A major; Theme and nineteen variations; Miniatures; Sonnets and Songs without words (3 books); "Characteristic popular tunes of the British Isles" (duets), &c.

Organ.—Fantasia and fugue (in MS.).

Vocal.—English lyrics (four sets); Three Odes of Anacreon; Six Shakespearean and several other songs, &c.; Twenty Part-songs; Anthems; Service in D; Hymn-tunes, &c.

A very large number of works, including a Nonet in B flat for wind, remain in manuscript.

We have already stated that Sir Hubert Parry took the degree of Bachelor in Music at Oxford in 1867. In the year 1883 he was appointed Choragus of the University, Doctor in Music (honoris causâ) in the University of Cambridge, and Professor of Composition and Musical History in the Royal College of Music, on its opening in that year. In the next year (1884) Oxford followed the example of the sister University in bestowing the distinction D.Mus., as did Dublin in 1891. He is also a D.C.L. of Durham University, an Honorary Fellow of Exeter College, Oxford, and a Justice of the Peace for the County of Gloucester. Sir Hubert was an examiner in music at the London University in 1891. In 1894, on the retirement of Sir George Grove, C.B., he was appointed Director of the Royal College of Music, where, like his distinguished predecessor, he is very popular and greatly esteemed by both professors and students. His most recent distinction is that of Knighthood, conferred upon him in the sixty-first year of Queen Victoria's reign, and in commemoration of her seventy-ninth birthday.

LITERARY ACHIEVEMENTS.

If Sir Hubert Parry had not achieved fame as a composer he would be entitled to high distinction as a writer on music and musical subjects. He was one of the first whom Sir George Grove asked to contribute to his "Dictionary of Music and Musicians," and for a time he sub-edited that important and invaluable work. Parry's masterly articles in "Grove" have attracted widespread attention by reason of their intellectual grasp of the various subjects upon which he has so ably and so exhaustively written. The article on "Form" is one of the best and most concise in the language, and of equal merit are those on the "Symphony" and on "Variations," besides many others. When he was writing the article on "Symphony" he had no less than sixty-four volumes in use at the British Museum at one time! He arranged them in batches of eight, being the number of parts in the early symphonies and overtures, and read the works in that manner. It is no wonder that the attendant came to him and said: "Would you mind, sir, taking a seat near the central desk?" The poor man must have groaned under the weight of those books in carrying them to their omniverous reader. Parry is nothing if he is not thorough. It is almost impossible to speak in terms too eulogistic of his "The Art of Music," now available in a cheaper form as "The Evolution of the Art of Music." It is sufficient to say that this book should not only be in the possession, but should be read by every English musician worthy of the name. No wonder that it occupied him on and off for nine years. It is packed full of material of the greatest interest and value to every musical student. Sir Hubert speaks of the valuable assistance he received from the great thinker, Mr. Herbert Spencer, in respect of the dancing and music of savage races.

Sir Hubert's other published contributions to musical literature include that excellent little book "Studies of great Composers," and "A Summary of Musical History," No. 42 of Novello's Primers, of which he has recently become joint-editor with Sir John Stainer. He has also contributed to the Academy, in which he wrote a review of Stainer and Barrett's "Dictionary of Musical Terms," and also some articles to the defunct Musical Review.

He has lectured on musical subjects at the Royal Institution, at the Midland Institute, Birmingham, at the Royal College of Music, and elsewhere. Science has always had an attraction for him, and in this connection he has given some lectures on astronomy at Littlehampton. On one occasion he took the chair at a lecture given by a gentleman on the microscope; but as the lecturer got into difficulties with his illustrations, the chairman came to the rescue and extemporised on his own microscopic experiences in order to keep the audience amused.

TENNYSON.

THE LAST YEAR. 1892. In January Dr. Hubert Parry stayed with us at Farringford, for he wished to hear my father read "The Lotos Eaters," which he was setting to music. For the first time my father's voice, usually so strong, failed while reading this poem and the "Ode on the Duke of Wellington," which he was anxious that a great composer should set as he read it.*

Upon being asked to recall this incident as recorded by the son of the late Laureate, Sir Hubert says: "The Tennysons were supremely kind to me. Tennyson himself talked to me a great deal about his methods and technique. He agreed with me that Browning made it 'a point of art' to introduce alliteration; 'but,' said Tennyson, 'whenever a line comes into my head that I think sounds very nice, I sometimes find it is through alliteration, and I generally take it out.' Again: 'Browning, he was a musical man. He went in for music and knew all about it, but there is no music in his verse. I don't know anything about music, and I don't go in for it like Browning, but I know that there is music in my verse.'"

* 'Tennyson. A Memoir by his son." ii., 393. (Macmillan, 1897.)

YACHTING.

The Isle of Wight suggests Sir Hubert Parry's favourite recreation—yachting. "I suppose I shall be drowned some day," he says. (On repeating this remark to Mr. Dannreuther, he observes: "Well, what is the use of a Shelley unless one follows his example?") "I was very nearly drowned," continues Sir Hubert, "when I was twelve years old, in coming from Nice to Marseilles. A little more obstinacy on my part, and I should have been pitched over into the Mediterranean and provided food for the sharks. I have been nearly drowned heaps of times. Once I went round the Isle of Wight in a gale, and nearly drove my skipper out of his wits. 'You ain't been drowned yet,' he observed, 'but you've done your very best.' I began yachting through having to live at Littlehampton for many years on account of my wife's health. I started with a 2-tonner, then followed a 7-tonner, now I have a 21-tonner, and I daresay I shall have a bigger yacht some day."

The following is a characteristic boating story concerning the genial Director of the Royal College of Music. One day he was enjoying a very elysium of happiness sailing all alone in a canoe in a very stiff breeze. He was capsized and had to swim about two miles to terra firma. But he would not lose the boat, and towed it ashore with the rope of the boat between his teeth, an operation which took nearly an hour and a half!

In 1872 Sir Hubert Parry married Lady Elizabeth Maude, sister of the present Earl of Pembroke. Their two daughters are both musical—the elder, Mrs. Arthur Ponsonby, plays the pianoforte, and the younger, Miss Gwendolen Parry, is an excellent violinist. Sir Hubert wrote his popular "Twelve short pieces for violin and pianoforte" for his two children. Those in the secret know that in one of these pieces he purposely introduced an oft-repeated figure in order to cure one of the young ladies of a rhythmic fault! It might naturally be assumed that Sir Hubert is a "society man." But, as a matter of fact, the contrary is the case. "I don't suppose," he says, "that I dine out more than half-a-dozen times in the course of a year. I don't like it. I couldn't get through what I've got to do if I did; but I generally manage to spend the week-end in the country."

In conclusion, the personality of Sir Hubert Parry is remarkably striking. He is unconventional to a degree. His frank geniality, no less than his breezy enthusiasm, is a strong characteristic of his generous nature. He is a thorough English gentleman. Moreover, he is a true artist, animated with the loftiest aspirations towards the highest ideals, and the cause of English music has no worthier representative than Hubert Parry.

MUSICIANS' NAMES.

Nomen, omen, runs the Latin proverb, and in view of the character of their calling it is not to be wondered at that musicians should have set considerable store by the possession of euphonious surnames. We use the past tense intentionally, however, since the present generation of musicians has practically discarded the habit of improving upon their real names. Thus a vocal and violin recital was recently announced by Mdlle. Kuznitsky and M. Przemysler. When music, heavenly maid, was younger, her votaries would have hardly dared to appear in public under such formidable patronymics. Mr. W. H. Hadow, in his interesting monograph on Haydn, gives a list of musicians of Croatian origin who modified the uncompromisingly consonantal character of their names on going out into the world, and amongst them we find the famous Tartini—composer of the "Trillo del Diavolo"—whose authentic surname was, if we remember aright, entirely destitute of vowels. And M. Victorin Joncières, in the Revue Internationale de la Musique, has recently been telling the tragic story of the unproduced opera of "Imogine," accepted by the Académie Royale in 1826, and composed by a certain Schneitzhöffer, who had printed on his visiting cards, beneath his real name, the delightful addition—"Prononcez Bertrand."

We are not prepared to say who was the first musician who boldly determined to show in his own person that a cacophonous name need not prove a handicap to a maker of melody. Habitués of the opera thirty years or so back may remember a famous tenor of the name of Tamberlik, which cannot exactly be called a mellifluous designation, and the same remark applies to another tenor of a somewhat more recent date—M. Mierzwinski. In this country, however, we cannot help regarding Mr. Barton McGuckin as the great pioneer, innovator, and reformer in the matter of musical nomenclature. A good story is told of this popular tenor to the effect that, shortly before his professional début, he consulted a distinguished musician as to his prospects, and that the latter said, "You want one thing—a new name." Mr. McGuckin, however, heroically resolved to disregard this counsel, and subsequent events have amply vindicated the wisdom of his resolve. A "magnificently ugly" name is far more efficacious than a merely commonplace one. Quite recently a spirited protest was uttered in a leading American paper against the determination of the authorities to re-christen a village near New York, called Speonk, on the ground that Speonk had a unique individuality, which entirely redeemed its lack of euphony. This we take to be equally true of such names as McGuckin, Dvorák, Szczepanowski, or Humperdinck.

An interesting article might be written on the growth and decline of the habit of Italianisation in names. John Cooper, who changed his name to Coperario during a sojourn in Italy at the close of the sixteenth century, and retained that form after his return to England, may be regarded as the first notable example of the practice. One of the last was the late Mr. Gilbert Campbell, who assumed the name of Signor Ghilberti, and afterwards, on reverting to his real name, occasionally added "Signor Ghilberti" in brackets. There was another Mr. Campbell who was also well known some twenty years ago on the concert platform and the stage as Signor Enrico Campobello, but he remained constant to the Italian form to the end of his career. We cannot help thinking, however, that the American basso, Giulio Perkins, unconsciously dealt the practice its death-blow, if it be true that nothing kills like ridicule. But it is only fair to the memory of that fine singer to state that the adoption of the Italianised Christian name was entirely due to the instigation of his impresario—who is reported to have clinched his argument by the observation: "It makes the people talk, dear boy"—and was quite against the better judgment of the singer himself. Indeed, if we mistake not, his style and title were altered to Mr. Jules Perkins not long before his death. So long as Italy was the centre of the operatic world, it was natural enough that singers should endeavour to associate themselves with the land of song, to say nothing of the fact that there is an incomparable charm and melody about Italian names. Speaking broadly, there are no ugly names in Italy; there is no chance of a golden voice being lodged in the throat of the wearer of a name like, say, Jemima Jubb, Susan Hogg, or John Spratt. Still, of late years, where singers have adopted fancy or quasi-Italian names, they have done it in such a way as to afford a clue to their place of birth or residence—Madame Albani taking her name from Albany, Madame Nevada from the State of that name, and Madame Melba from Melbourne. There is also a Canadian singer in Paris who styles herself Mdlle. Toronta. Perhaps, however, the most ingenious of these territorial pseudonyms was that of the singer from Brooklyn, who called himself Signor Broccolini.

We must never forget that foreign names which seem odd to us may sound perfectly natural in the ears of the compatriots of their owners. Kisch-Schorr and Crikkeboom, to take the first two that occur to us, are no doubt perfectly obvious and ordinary to German or Dutch hearers, though they would probably freely admit the superior euphony of such names as Gemma Bellincioni, Camilla Landi, or Vittoria Corleone. But for the reasons which we have already mentioned, the habit of Italianisation has fallen into desuetude. It remains to be seen whether, as a result of the Slavonic "boom," we shall all take to decorating our patronymics with the suffixes -off, -ski, or -vitch.

FROM MY STUDY.

BY reading Julien Tiersot's article "Les Troyens de Berlioz en Allemagne," in the issue of the Revue Internationale de Musique for June 15, readers may add considerably to their knowledge of the French composer. Mr. Tiersot's paper was inspired by attendance at a performance, in Cologne, of "Les Troyens à Carthage." The only feature of that representation needing to be considered here is one upon which the critic prefers to dwell—namely, the respect with which the work was treated, as compared with its customary fate in France. "In Germany," says Mr. Tiersot, 'Les Troyens' is played without a cut, and even much is added." This statement excites one's interest.

"The history of the cuts in 'Les Troyens,'" continues our author, "is, from the art point of view, somewhat humiliating. Doubtless one need not, generally speaking, exaggerate susceptibilities, and make the matter of cuts an absolute question of principle . . . but the composer remains sole judge, and his will should be paramount. Unhappily this theory is not that of many directors, or of some publishers, who desire with all their force to play the part of collaborateurs in the works which they stage or publish, and no opera has suffered more than 'Les Troyens' from that kind of abuse." Mr. Tiersot next addresses himself to the principal illustrations of the fact last stated. He, first of all, reminds us that "Les Troyens" was designed for performance on one evening, but, when completed, the work appeared much too long. It was therefore divided into two parts, the first being called "La Prise de Troie" (three acts), the second (five acts and a prologue), "Les Troyens à Carthage." Berlioz accepted this necessity, and recognised it in his MS. full score bequeathed by him to the library of the Conservatoire. Of the three volumes the first is headed in the master's hand, "La Prise de Troie," the second bearing the superscription, "Les Troyens à Carthage." Nevertheless, as Mr. Tiersot points out, Berlioz clung to the idea of a complete performance in one evening, and wrote at the head of the prologue to "Les Troyens à Carthage": "In case it be desired to perform the entire work on the same occasion, this prologue should be omitted." It must not be supposed that Berlioz consented without a struggle to the division of his opera. Readers of his memoirs and letters know that he did nothing of the kind, but fought hard for its integrity. Apropos, Mr. Tiersot prints, for the first time, a letter addressed by the master to one of his admirers, some two years after the event. In this we read:—

"I have neither been surprised nor greatly afflicted by the modest fortune of 'Les Troyens' for the simple reason that I have long known the Parisians. The immortal 'Alceste' of Gluck has lately been mounted at the Opéra with every musical and scenic resource, but it was impossible to give more than seventeen representations. The real Parisian papers covered that sublime work with insults, and the Opéra subscribers wrote to the Minister of State begging him to relieve them from that tiresome score, &c. I consider myself very fortunate that, in a theatre without resources, where I was obliged myself to pay a certain number of performers, where the mise-en-scène was a miserable farce, where the chorus was so badly remunerated, I had twenty-two representations. But the mutilations of the work, that is what has wounded me and will never be forgotten, any more than the false effects produced by the incorrectness of the performance. . . . I shake your hand, felicitating you upon having conserved your faith in the vitality of art. For myself, I have no more, and I say, speaking of men, very much what a poet has remarked concerning women: 'Art is not made for them; they feel no want of it.'" Mr. Tiersot gives some particulars of the ten numbers which were cut from the great work before its production, but I pass these to notice the composer's remarkable observations written on the pages of the MS. score. Here, as Mr. Tiersot truly says, we recognise our Berlioz. At the end of the first act the following note appears:—

"If this work is performed in a theatre not large enough for the development of the mise-en-scène connected with the distribution of rewards by Dido, or if the stage manager is not ingenious enough properly to organise the three processions of builders, sailors, and labourers throughout the duration of the three instrumental pieces connected with them, all that is included between" such and such points "should be suppressed."

Following the intermezzo of the Chase, Berlioz wrote:—

"In case the theatre is not large enough for an animated and grandiose spectacle, if women chorus-singers cannot be found to lead the spare horses about the stage, nor men singers, dressed as fauns and satyrs, to gambol when crying 'Italie'; if the firemen are afraid of fire, the machinists of water, and the manager afraid of all, and especially if the change of scene cannot rapidly be made before the third act, the symphony should be omitted."

After the third act, another direction appears:—

"In the middle of this act, the song of Jopas was omitted at Paris because they had no light tenor capable of singing it well. In the extremely probable case of the same reason existing in other theatres, the song should be suppressed."

Digitized by Google

After the fourth act:—

"If the singer who takes the rôle of Dido has not an energetic voice, and might lack power for the fifth act, it will be prudent to leave out her duet with Eneas in Act 4."

There is here an interesting note, not in the hand-writing of Berlioz, though obviously dictated by him:—

"I forgot to say that one can, in passing without transition from letter R to letter S, suppress the soldiers' duet, the somewhat vulgar familiarity of which produces so marked a contrast with the melancholy song of the sailor which precedes, and the passionate air of Eneas which follows it. It has been said that the French stage will not endure a mixture of tragedy and comedy, as if the opera of 'Don Giovanni' were not an admirable example of the good effect produced by that mixture; as if a crowd of dramas daily played in Paris did not offer excellent applications of that system; as if, in fine, Shakespeare were not there. It is true that, to the majority of French people, Shakespeare is not even as much as the sun to a mole, for moles can at least feel its warmth. I indicate again this cut, thinking of the happiness which managers, actors, conductors, machinists, and lampists will feel in insulting an author and degrading his work. I should be sorry not to facilitate as much as in me lies the satisfaction of such noble instincts."

All the bitter irony of Berlioz comes out here, but it should be remembered that he underwent immense provocation at the hands of the people whom he so scarifies. With the death of the master began what Mr. Tiersot calls the second act of the comedy of cuts. In 1874 the executors of Berlioz sought to compel his publishers to issue the full score of "Les Troyens à Carthage," which they had bound themselves to do within a year of its first performance. There is a clause in the composer's will with reference to this matter. It runs as follows:—

"The full score of the 'Troyens à Carthage' belongs to M———, music publisher, who, in acquiring from me the property in that work, engaged himself by contract to publish it a year after issuing the pianoforte score. He has not fulfilled that condition. I have not myself invoked the law; my executors will do what seems to them right and proper, but I absolutely require, should M——— decide to publish, that the score be issued without cuts, without modifications, without the least suppression of the text, in fine, exactly as it stands."

The publisher persisted in his refusal, and was supported by the court which tried the case, the successful plea being that inasmuch as Berlioz had bequeathed his MS. to the Conservatoire library, the defendant had not the means of carrying out his agreement. How poor a plea this was fully appears when we read in the master's will that the librarian was bound to lend the MS. to any publisher who, with the approval of the executors and heirs, should require it for the purpose of engraving and publishing the work in its integrity. On appeal, the decision of the lower court was reversed; M——— being told that he must fulfil the terms of his contract.

The third act of the comedy began when, the executors of Berlioz being dead, the publisher had nobody to overlook him. He took advantage of this, says Mr. Tiersot, by retaining the cuts made in representation, and adding others, "cutting eight bars here; suppressing four verses there," and so on. Mr. Tiersot gives details concerning these mutilations, and adds, what all must think, that such practices are "abominable." The whole story is a striking illustration of the obstacles which sometimes beset a composer who wishes to place himself honestly and fully before the public. Also is it an example of the strange notions that prevail with regard to musical works—notions which, in effect, consider them as open to any alteration which impudence or ignorance may think expedient. Mr. Tiersot's article should be read by all who are interested in the fortunes of masterpieces.

I have pleasure in reproducing here an interesting letter from Mr. T. King Holtham, of Chiswick, on the subject of phrasing classical themes. The subject is one of much importance, and worthy of all the prominence that can be given to it:—

In this month's issue of THE MUSICAL TIMES, "X.," in his article "From My Study," quotes some most valuable remarks and examples, by Mr. M. Rosenthal, on correct phrasing in classical music.

It is greatly to be wished that the older masters had taken more pains to indicate the exact manner in which they desired their compositions to be performed. So much is left to the innate musical instinct and imagination of the performer, that it is quite possible for one to gather a totally wrong conception of a particular phrase or melody.

I have found this slipshod way (if I may use such a term about the great ones of the earth) of indicating phrasing particularly trying in organ music, and notably in Mendelssohn's organ works. As these phrasing marks agree in the Novello and Peters editions, I presume they are Mendelssohn's own, but I cannot think that he himself performed these works in the manner indicated in print.

Original conceptions being, as a rule, the strongest, it is most embarrassing and disheartening to students, in playing such works to their masters for the first time, to find their preconceived ideas of the same all wrong, owing to a faulty and incomplete text; and as, in my humble opinion, the science of artistic organ playing consists, chiefly, in a thorough knowledge of when and how to take one's hands off the keys, it is most essential that the notation and phrasing of all printed organ music should be rigidly exact and absolutely correct.

May I therefore plead, on behalf of pupil and master, for editions of all classical music, carefully edited, but in noways adulterated, in an intelligent and musicianly manner by men of ability, in such a way as to fully express in the text the composer's mind and intention; this without any disrespect to the great masters, whose exuberance of musical ideas, no doubt, often outran their ability to fully transcribe them, hence the rather vague and incomplete manner in which they frequently appear in print.

Mr. Silas, in his series of articles, "Accidents on the Staves, and other matters," that have just appeared in Musical Opinion, is justly down on the unscrupulous music-adulterators; but, from his own showing, he has found the necessity of editing the classics in the matter of phrasing, expression, and pedal marks. He is so particularly down on the German editors and editions that I should much like his opinion as to the educational value of the "Cotta" and Steingräber editions of the classics.

I quote a few examples (many more might be instanced) of the phrasing of the Mendelssohn Organ Sonatas, taken at random from the editions previously mentioned, and my ideas of the phrasing of the same, which I suggest with all possible diffidence, as I should not wish it to be thought that I, in any way, presumed to instruct these gods of music.—Yours, &c.,

SOME RECOLLECTIONS.

MY good friends the proprietors of THE MUSICAL TIMES have asked me to contribute to their pages "leaves from the past." The exercise is popular just now, both with writers and readers, but not specially on that account have I consented. Reminiscences necessarily involve a good deal of the ego, and some men are not happy when constrained to speak about themselves. On the other hand, there are requests which long friendship and association with those who make them transform into commands. That is the case in the present instance, and so I address myself to the task imposed upon me.

A MAINZER CLASS.

One fine morning in the autumn of (I think) 1842, the little town of Berkeley, Gloucestershire, woke up to find bills in its shop windows and on its walls, headed "Singing for the Million." I have called my birthplace a town, though in point of size it was, and is, smaller than many villages. Village, indeed, some style it, but they have not, like myself, seen the mayor and corporation marching through the streets, which, by the way, were so few, and, in perspective, so brief, that a complete perambulation did not weary the fattest alderman. A town it was, and a very ancient one to boot, with a history running far back into Saxon times, and a castle which, though built in the reign of the second Henry, enjoys by comparison only a respectable antiquity. Alas! a town it is no longer. "Ichabod" has been written upon Berkeley's public buildings; the mayor and corporation have vanished; not a rag of their moth-eaten robes exists; the mace is shown as a curiosity in the castle hall, and the corporation pew in the parish church will be looked for in vain. So departs the glory of the world, and I must be pardoned for dwelling upon this particular example of the vanity of earthly things with some sadness. In my boyish days our mayor was to me an important personage—the more important because his functions were a mystery. He usually kept a shop, and as a tradesman was intelligible enough; as mayor he was vague and shadowy, a man of unknown powers and therefore to be dreaded by imaginative youngsters. His colleagues were like him, all except the ale-tasters, who, so it struck my boyish mind as the result of observation, were constant and vigilant in the discharge of their duties.

My reader is asking with impatience, "What has all this to do with the bills headed 'Singing for the Million?'" Not so fast, gentle friend. The bills were also superscribed, "Under the Patronage of the Worshipful the Mayor," who, I doubt not, gladly availed himself of an opportunity to see worship ascribed to him in print, while the townsfolk felt themselves committed to support the enterprise recommended by their civic chief. What the bills had to say beneath their impressive head-lines was that Mr. James Watts, organist of the neighbouring borough of Wotton-under-Edge, would hold a class for the teaching of singing in the Town Hall during the approaching winter. The happy phrase "Singing for the Million" was not unknown in Berkeley at the time. It had drifted across the smiling Severn Valley from other little places where classes were in progress; it had been met with in the Gloucester Journal and the Bristol Mercury, along with glowing reports of results achieved, and thus was created an impression that Mainzer had discovered a royal road to musical success, walking in which the wayfaring man, though a fool, could not err.

But Mr. Watts was coming to break fresh ground, if it were not too stubborn for the process. Our musical life was of the most limited description. In the great and imposing church, a monument of the piety or fears of the Berkeleys, there was a choir as competent as the materials allowed, thanks to the skill and devotion of the organist, Mr. Samuel Partridge, who walked over from Wotton-under-Edge, seven miles, every Sunday morning and back in the evening, summer and winter, rain or shine. I have grateful recollections of Mr. Partridge. My musical enthusiasms touched him; I was his solo boy, and he taught me much more than duty compelled. At the Independent Chapel, a very competent band of two violins, viola, violoncello, double-bass, and flute supported the singing; at the Wesleyan Chapel neither choir nor instrument was available, and the congregation had some difficulty in fitting the right tune to the hymn; often breaking down through mistakes in metre. For the rest, not even the faintest stirring of musical vitality could be observed when Mr. Watts broke in upon the dry bones with his Mainzer formula, and conjured them into, at any rate, a semblance of life.

Here I must tell how it came to pass that the Mainzer missionary was able to get a footing in the Town Hall—a rather important building for so small a place. The hall had been erected some decades earlier by subscription, and with the idea, I suppose, that it would be useful for town's meetings and other occasions of a public character. Vain delusion! There was no public life. The town took its orders from the castle, where reigned the powerful nobleman who, as the notorious Colonel Berkeley, made various sensations in society. With all things stagnant around, the hall was rarely used, until, by a happy change of destiny, it became a school-room, at the instance of an eccentric gentleman, long a puzzle to all the neighbours—and they were few—who did not pronounce him mad. According to the rude faith of those parts and that time Robert Fitzhardinge Jenner, major in the South Gloucester Militia, son and heir of the discoverer of vaccination; a friend of the great man at the castle, and, through his mother, related to the Kingscotes of Kingscote, could not possibly be "right in his head." He kept horses and never rode to hounds; he had guns and never shot at anything; he took an interest in children and none in game; and, instead of going to church, he attended the Independent Chapel. He it was who set up a British School in the Town Hall, superintended it himself as the power above the master, and had the control of the place. Wherefore he it was whom Mr. Watts approached in order to secure the hall for his class and the Mainzer formula. Major Jenner showed himself alert enough on that occasion, and drove rather a hard bargain with the Wotton-under-Edge organist. "Yes," said he, "you can have the hall, Mr. Watts, but you must give the upper forms of the British school, and a dozen boys from the Free school, a lesson in class each week for nothing." The organist bowed to the inevitable; the bills appeared, and the "boom" began.

At this point I came upon the scene as a boy of eleven years, consumed with a passion for music which, save for my training in the church choir, could not possibly be gratified. But let me keep myself in reserve, and go farther with the main current of events. Our little town answered the appeal of the bills, to say nothing of the patronage of the Mayor, with an approving shout. Young men and maidens, old men and children came forward to enrol themselves among the disciples of Watts. The soul of our "million" was in arms and eager for the fray, to the astonishment of exceptions, who, of course, began to scoff. Well, the demonstration was wonderful, because nobody had had reason to believe in any latent enthusiasm for the divine art. Alas, alas! the spark which set the enthusiasm aflame was kindled by a delusion! But let me not anticipate more than is necessary to say that the delusion did not affect me. Thanks to my master, I had trodden the whole length of the weary road which leads to easy sight-singing, and I knew what lay before the ardent and unsuspecting pupils of the Mainzer class. They had no such knowledge, or, if they had, argued that "singing for the million" must make the million sing, and there was the whole thing in a nutshell.

I can recall as vividly as though it happened but yesterday the circumstances under which the class first met. There was the appearance of Mr. Watts in the gossiping street. He was a little dark man, with a very lame right leg, and limped along quite awkwardly, from which fact some believers in the religion of physical perfection argued that he could not be of much account as a teacher. All the same, I know him to have been a capital master and an excellent organist. He subsequentlyr emoved from Wotton-under-Edge to the parish in which Lord Derby's place near Liverpool is situated. I should be glad to know if any of my Lancashire readers remember him there. Then there was the eager crowd of men, women, and children massing themselves, with the sexes divided, before a platform on which stood a square pianoforte and a chair. I have but vague memories of the lesson book put into each person's hand. My recollection is clear, however, that, from the height of my superior knowledge, the exercises seemed particularly easy. And so they were; the crux was to come. Enter Mr. Watts (cheers), who, I dare say, stood a moment looking complacently upon the number of his pupils, and praying, poor gentleman, that there might be long continuance and increasing. At that instant the Major appeared in the doorway. I can see him now, caressing his militia moustache and running a pair of keen eyes along the rows of faces. The pupils sat up under the inspection, while smiles pervaded the lines. But the heir of vaccination had nothing to say. He grunted approval—being often inarticulate—and vanished from sight.

Through all the years between then and now I have retained consciousness of the physical effect made upon me by very many more voices than I had ever heard singing together. It mattered not that they were rough and uncultivated, or that they were kept monotoning on sol, with presently a creep up to la, or down to fa, as a first step towards conquering the entire scale. The effect, anyhow, was a revelation to my youthful mind, and one which memory brings back, when I wish it, with almost pristine impressiveness. It seemed to open up to me a new world of tone, while my Biblical reading enabled me to hear in it "the sound of many waters." So the evening passed and we were all fascinated with the ease and certainty with which, helped by the square pianoforte, we had moved through three degrees of the scale. Everybody was delighted with himself. Surely Mr. Mainzer was a god, and Mr. Watts his prophet. Here was indeed "singing for the million." We were to be led along smooth and flowery paths to the consummation of knowledge, and stand where all the mysteries of music lay open to our gaze. Happy souls, "and all agog to rush through thick and thin," Cowper might have said of us. Of course the cynical mocked, but they could not fail to be impressed by the remarkable fact that, in pursuit of the divine art, church joined with chapel; for the rule was that the one had no more to do with the other than had the Jews of old with their neighbours the Samaritans. The spectacle of unity under the ægis of music became the marvel of the hour.

Alas, that I must go on to speak of disintegration—of the little rift within the lute that, ever widening, eventually made the music mute. Our class romped, so to speak, through the diatonic scale of C major, weaving and interweaving as in a kind of maze when proceeding by grades, and jumping intervals with joyous confidence. It was beautiful, and so easy! But, one fatal day, the little man on the platform bade his pupils take up an exercise in the "signature" of which one sharp appeared. Ah, miserable sharp! It knocked the class off its bearings, and gave it the impression of being at sea without compass or rudder. Fancy; a note on the second line was still sol, and one in the first space still fa, but movement from sol to fa was not the same as before. It demanded a new note altogether. So, in going from do to sol, the bewildered students found the half-tone so joyously mastered in previous lessons shifted to a strange place. The old relations between mi and fa, and fa and sol were broken up. That discovery was the beginning of the end. Looking ahead, the class saw, instead of a royal road, a thoroughfare full of pitfalls and overrun by thorns and briars. Discouragement deepened more and more as it gradually appeared that, while the names of the notes remained unchanged, each might represent three different sounds. This was too bad. The old enthusiasm began to wane, attendance became irregular; Mainzer was apparently a fraud, and Watts a mere prophesier of smooth things which never came to pass. When the second session opened it did so with sadly diminished numbers; but these, of course, had the root of the matter in them to some extent, and were displayed at a public performance. But it was practically all over. The inherent vice of Mainzer's system killed enthusiasm, and tonic sol-fa, which really is a royal road as far as it goes, was not yet. So the class came to an end; the million ceased to sing and lapsed into inglorious silence. Not all of them, however, for the really musical went on, and laid a foundation of better things in later years.

Something like the foregoing story might no doubt be told of a thousand places, as marking the exciting days which saw the means of music first brought within reach of the people at large. Days were they of abundant promise and still greater disappointment; of some faithfulness and large abandonment; but whatever they were, then was laid the basis upon which the superstructure of musical England now rests.

JOSEPH BENNETT.

A VERY interesting side-light on Mr. Gladstone's remarkable knowledge of and keen observation in regard to music has recently been furnished by the distinguished American, the Hon. Chauncey M. Depew, one of the most cultured and esteemed, as well as one of the wealthiest citizens in the United States, and, moreover, the doyen of American statesmen. Mr. Depew says:—

A few years ago, during one of my visits to London, I was one evening at the opera in a box with Mr. Gladstone. He listened intently to the performance, and during the entr'acte he gave me a history of musical progress during his life-time. "For sixty years," he said, "I have been a lover of the opera," and he went on to relate the whole story of opera during that time. He mentioned all the great composers contemporary with himself and their principal works, giving the weak points and distinctive marks of one man's music against those of another; balancing the strength of one against the claims of a rival; differentiating between the exact shades of distinction in two men o the same school. Then he went on to the singers, and compared the great singers of yesterday, the Marios and the Grisis with the Pattis, the Albanis, and the De Reszkes of to-day. Had anyone who did not know him heard him talk, he would have said: "Here is some old musical critic, who, for half-a-century, has devoted his life to nothing but musical studies." After he had finished his review, Mr. Gladstone said: "For thirty years opera was to me a constant source of enjoyment; but for the last thirty years I have been unable to listen to it with any real pleasure. The conductors of Covent Garden Theatre raised the musical pitch, and this led to the introduction of the tremolo. When the pitch was raised, many singers could not take their top notes without the tremolo, and, since the tremolo has come in, opera has been spoiled for me."

BEETHOVEN'S three "Equale" for four trombones have recently attracted so much attention in connection with their performance at Mr. Gladstone's funeral that we propose to give, as far as possible, a complete account of their history. In the autumn of 1812, the year of the seventh and eighth symphonies, Beethoven stayed with his brother Johann, an apothecary, at Linz, in Upper Austria. The period of his visit covered All Souls' Day—a day that has long been observed with pious solemnity in Austria. Herr Glöggl, the Domcapellmeister of Linz Cathedral, asked Beethoven to compose something for trombones to be performed at the approaching solemn commemoration. Beethoven duly acceded to this request and wrote the "Equale"—three short pieces—of which the opening themes are as follows:—

No. 1. Andante.

No. 2. Poco adagio.

No. 3. Poco sostenuto.

THE original autograph, inscribed by Beethoven "Linz den 2ten 9ber, 1812" (i.e., All Souls' Day), was formerly in the possession of Haslinger, the music publisher of Vienna; but Herr Eusebius Mandyczewski, the great Viennese authority on Beethoven, reports that the manuscript cannot now be traced. The term "Equal," or "Equale," is self-explanatory, but its origin seems to be unknown. It has come to signify a short piece, or pieces of music, usually for trombones, played at the beginning and conclusion of great funerals. Sometimes an extra piece, alternating with vocal music, was played in the middle of the funeral service; thus we get "Three Equale," as in the case of those composed by Beethoven. Mr. George Case, who has so commendably resuscitated Beethoven's "Equale," is of opinion that the underlying idea of this quartet of trombones is in "the crossing of the Styx." It is to be found in Monteverde's "Orfeo," in Gluck's "Orfeo," and probably elsewhere. Another ecclesiastical use of a combination of brass instruments should be mentioned. In some parts of Germany it is the custom to play a chorale by a "trombone-choir" (Posaunenchor) from the church tower on the mornings of the great church festivals.

BEETHOVEN had little idea, when he wrote the "Equale" at Linz, that fifteen years later they would form part of his own requiem. On March 26, 1827, Haslinger, anticipating a fatal termination to Beethoven's illness, took the autograph of the "Equale" to Seyfried, with the request that he would adapt some of the words of the "Miserere" thereto, in order that the remains of the mighty master of music might be accompanied to their last resting-place to the plaintive and solemn harmonies of his own sublime composition. Beethoven died on March 27 and the funeral took place two days later. The procession from Beethoven's house moved in the following order: the cross-bearer; four trombone players (the brothers Böck, Waidl, and Tuschky); the leader of the choristers, and, under his direction, a choir of singers. The trombone quartet was not employed as an accompaniment to the choir—the one relieved the other during the progress of the procession to the church. First, the trombonists played the opening movement of the "Equale" alone, which was then repeated by being sung, unaccompanied, to the words "Miserere mei," but a tone lower, in C minor instead of D minor. The third movement of the "Equale" followed, and was treated in a similar manner to the preceding, being sung to the words of the "Amplius," and so on alternately. Another movement, to the words "Libera me, Domine," was also performed; but this was composed by Seyfried, and was originally intended to form a continuation of Mozart's "Requiem." The second "Equal" (in D) was performed, but only at the graveside. Much confusion has arisen on the subject in addition to some erroneous information, which can be most easily set right by recording the fact that while all the three "Equale" by Beethoven were performed at his funeral, only two (Nos. 1 and 3) were sung and played on the way to the Church.

Two only of Beethoven's "Equale" were published by Tobias Haslinger in June, 1827; but with Seyfried's adaptation for voices, and not in their original form. It was not until the year 1888 that these three simple specimens of Beethoven's genius were given to the world in their unalloyed beauty, when they appeared in the supplementary volume of Breitkopf and Härtel's complete edition of Beethoven's works. An English edition of the Seyfried arrangement of two of the "Equale" was issued by J. Alfred Novello more than sixty years ago and may still be obtained. The title-page, upon which is engraved a representation of "The tomb of Beethoven in the village of Währing," is as follows:

THE MUSIC performed at BEETHOVEN'S funeral, newly arranged, and cordially inscribed to his friend Mr. J. A. Stumpff, by VINCENT NOVELLO.

THERE was nothing more impressive in the music performed at Mr. Gladstone's funeral in Westminster Abbey on May 28 than the strains of the "Equale." These three pieces in their original form were most beautifully played by the London Trombone Quartet (Messrs. George Case, C. Hadfield, A. E. Matt, and John Matt), and formed an ideal prelude to that memorable burial service. The four trombone players—two altos, one tenor, and one bass—were stationed in the chantry of Henry V. above the high altar. The hushed stillness which pervaded the noble fane was broken with indescribable tenderness as the sustained chord of D minor fell upon the ears of the great congregation in tones of weird solemnity and exquisite pathos.

SIR ALEXANDER MACKENZIE, Principal of the Royal Academy of Music, and Sir Hubert Parry, Director of the Royal College of Music, received official invitations to attend Mr. Gladstone's funeral, and were present at the obsequies of the illustrious statesman. Sir John Stainer, who was invited as a friend of the family, travelled nearly 1,000 miles in order to attend. He left Aberdeen on the afternoon of the previous day (Friday) and travelled to Glasgow on the day of the funeral, spending both nights in the train.

ANTIGUA is one of those West Indian Islands better known for its sweet fruits than its sweet sounds. But this is probably because we hear so little of the musical doings in that sugar-producing region beyond the sea. However, a correspondent who has just returned from the West Indies supplies us with the following gratifying information in regard to music in Antigua. He says: "On May 9 I attended a sacred concert in the Moravian Church, St. John, Antigua, when I had the great pleasure of hearing a choir of black and coloured singers render Sir John Stainer's 'Daughter of Jairus' in a most excellent manner with organ accompaniment. I enclose a programme. All the music was capitally rendered and above the average of country church choirs here in England." Well done, Antiguans! Such an unusually interesting event not only calls for more than passing notice, but merits heartiest congratulations. We shall always be glad to hear of similar performances in far away corners of our vast empire.

THE numerous friends and admirers of Herr Julius Stockhausen in this country will be pleased and interested to hear of his having just celebrated his artist's jubilee, at his residence in Frankfort-on-Main. The great German baritone, still in the enjoyment of excellent health and spirits, made his first public appearance at a concert given in Paris, on May 25, 1848, by his revered teacher, Signor Manuel Garcia.

SIR HUBERT PARRY has a strong belief in the value of choral music. His various choral works give every indication that the chorus has a warm place in his affections. The following extract from his invaluable book "The Art of Music," not only contains words of encouragement to "every member of the chorus," but words of wisdom to composers in regard to their proper treatment of the words they set to music:

There is nothing more ideally suited to the inward nature of music than the presentation, in the closest and most characteristic terms, of great reflective and dramatic poems and odes by genuine poets; and for such purposes the chorus is ideally suited. The declamatory method of treating the voices, which is growing up and increasing, makes every member of the chorus take a share in the recital of the poem; and the practice of choral singing may yet become a happier means for the diffusion of real refinement of mind and character among large sections of the people than the world has hitherto ever had the fortune to contrive. A composer who has enough cultivation and refinement of mind to appreciate great poems, and commensurate mastery of the arts of choral music and instrumentation, may emphasise the beauties of a poem and bring out its meaning far more effectually than any amount of commentary and explanation. This is eminently a case which illustrates the value of the rich accumulation of resources of various kinds, and the wide facilities which they offer to modern composers; for till comparatively lately the range of design and the power of composers to wield varieties of means so as to make the form intelligible was so limited, that unless poems were constructed purposely to fit into conventional types of musical form, they could not be effectively set. But since Beethoven has shown how various are the means of making a work of musical art coherent, systematic, and intelligible, and other composers of the modern school have discovered how to adapt various means of expression to the requirements of musical form, there need be but few poems which are in a mood adapted for music that will not admit of an effectual treatment. And the advantages composers now enjoy are so copious that there is little excuse for their adopting the feeble resource, which once was so universal, of repeating words and sentences without reference to their importance; for with increased range of means of expression and design poems can perfectly well be presented in conformity with the poet's intentions.

WHO would have thought, twenty years ago, that Music would be subsidised by what is practically the municipal authority of London? Yet such a seeming impossibility has become a possibility, as the daily open-air performances by excellent bands during the summer months in London abundantly testify—these bands, or bandsmen, it is hardly necessary to add, being paid entirely by the London County Council. Who, now, amongst the most flint-hearted of ratepayers in London would seriously object to the £8,000 annually spent for this purpose by "the powers that be" at Spring Gardens? And what aspirant for a County Councillorship would dream of making "no bands" a feature of his candidature? As a matter of fact, the principle of the thing is not only admitted, but it is firmly established. If brass bands, why not opera?

THIS question awaits an answer from the County Council of London. A memorial was presented, by Mr. H. W. L. Lawson, to that representative and administrative body on the 21st ult., of which the following are the first and last clauses:—

That in this, the richest capital in the world, there exists no means whereby the highest class of operatic music can be systematically brought within the reach of the great mass of people.

That your Council shall take such steps as to them appear advisable to ascertain how the great want referred to above can be best supplied, and, if deemed necessary, to obtain powers to devote some portion of their funds to assist in the maintenance of an opera-house for the promotion of the highest form of musical art.

The petition was largely and influentially signed, the names including those illustrious in every branch of art and science, such as Sir W. B. Richmond, Messrs. Alma Tadema, Alfred Gilbert, and others amongst painters and sculptors; Mr. George Meredith, Sir Walter Besant, Messrs. F. C. Burnand and Barrie, as representing literature; Sir Joseph Fayrer, Sir W. MacCormac, and Sir W. H. Broadbent amongst medical men; Lord Justice Chitty, Lord Justice Collins, and the Attorney-General among lawyers; Sir Henry Irving, Sir Squire Bancroft, Messrs. Henry Arthur Jones and Charles Wyndham as representing the drama; the Duke of Westminster, Mr. Chamberlain, and Mr. John Morley representing the Legislature, and, of course, a large number of representative musicians. Not only had The Times a leading article highly favourable to the proposal, but the Daily Mail wrote enthusiastically in the same strain. Moreover, the latter journal obtained the opinions of various Councillors, and it is interesting to find that not only are some "Progressive" members in favour of the proposal, but so representative a "Labour" councillor as Mr. John Burns approves! These expressions of approval encourage the hope that this significant memorial will eventually lead to practical results. At all events, a very important step has been taken towards attaining a very desirable end, which is, in the concluding words of the Daily Mail leader, to "give the community the best art, and put it within the reach of the masses of the people."

In the very interesting memoir of his brother, W. G. Wills, the poetic dramatist, which Mr. Freeman Wills has just given to the world, there are many interesting references to the allied arts. For example, we learn that one of Wills's idiosyncrasies was the help which he received from music. It seemed to lend wings to his thought. Thus he purchased a large musical box which played a number of operatic airs, and he used to wind it up and write to its strains. "In course of time, however, from being made the receptacle of hair-brushes and combs, and other odds and ends, it became disabled," and when it fell into the biographer's hands all its teeth were gone. Like his prototype, Oliver Goldsmith, whom he so closely resembled in a variety of ways, Wills played the flute in his youth, and took up other musical instruments in turn; but, as his brother tells us, it seemed only as if it were to satisfy the desire to overcome the preliminary difficulties, for he hardly ever pursued anything with a view to a practical end. Wills is best known by his charming plays "Olivia" and "Charles I.," but he wrote many admirable lyrics, the best being "I'll sing thee songs of Araby," which, in its way, is as good as anything Moore ever wrote.

On the road to Mornex, in the vicinity of Geneva, and amidst picturesque surroundings, there may be seen a summer residence of quaint architectural design, which derives a special interest from the fact of its having been inhabited at different periods by Richard Wagner and by Mr. John Ruskin. At the instance of three art-loving Genevese gentlemen, MM. Henri Kling and Robert and Laurence Harvey, a commemorative tablet in black marble has just been placed against the villa in question, bearing the following inscription: "Ici vécurent deux Immortels —Richard Wagner, 1856—John Ruskin, 1863-1864." The ceremony of unveiling took place on the 5th ult., in the presence of the Mayor of Mornex and the Municipal Councillors. It was here, during the months of July to September, that the Bayreuth master commenced the composition of "Siegfried," and sketched out the poem of "Tristan und Isolde," as indicated in one of his letters to Liszt, dated Mornex, July 13, 1856.

Scene: The final chorus rehearsal of the Choral Symphony for the Richter Concert of the 20th ult. Hans Richter (addressing the choir): "When you come to the Hall on Monday night, will you bring a little joy, enthusiasm with you? The widow of the greatest composer of music for the stage will be present, and she has not heard this symphony since the laying of the foundation-stone of the theatre at Bayreuth in—eighteen thousand, seventy-two!"

Here is another examination-room story. Beyond recording the fact that it has not been sent to us by an examiner, or even by an examinee, the story shall tell its own tale. At one of the University examinations in music a candidate appeared before the examiner for his vivâ voce, and was asked a question on the subject of the Church Modes. He said in reply: "I don't know anything about the Church Modes, sir; I am a Dissenter." He passed.

What are the "three classes of the secrets of the art" of singing? The question is prompted by an advertisement in a local suburban newspaper which reads thus:—

Repeated Successes.—A Fellow of the Royal Academy of Music imparts to those who wish really to sing, three classes of the secrets of the art. Apply, &c.

Without casting any reflection upon the gentleman (or lady) who possesses these three (why three?) secrets of the art, it is abundantly evident that there must be a great many professors of singing who are not voice trainers, but voice strainers.

Whatever evidences a ballad singer might give of a beggarly voice, we should hardly call him (or her) a vagrant. But this was the designation applied to the species, presumably good, bad, or indifferent, by the worthy magistrates of Amersham, as the following intimation, copied from a notice-board exhibited at the entrance to the little Buckinghamshire town, unmistakably testifies: "The magistrates acting for this Hundred have given peremptory orders to the constables and other peace officers to apprehend all Common Beggars, Ballad Singers, and other vagrants, so that they may be dealt with according to law. June 24,, 1811."

In Thomas Attwood Walmisley's fine Evening Service in D minor the Nunc dimittis concludes with the dominant major chord, while the Magnificat terminates with the chord of D major. At King's College, Cambridge, however, it is the custom to reverse the final Amens of the two Canticles in order to obtain a close in the tonic key in the Nunc dimittis. It would be interesting to know if this practice is followed in other "quires and places where they sing."

FACTS, RUMOURS, AND REMARKS.

Although the petition lately laid before the County Council on behalf of an opera house supported in part out of the rates was very influentially signed, it is wise not to expect much in the way of practical result. There is a question whether the London ratepayer, upon whom increasing taxation presses heavily, will see, clearly and at once, the propriety of paying £15,000 a year towards the support of the lyric stage. It may come to that in time; meanwhile the ratepayer must be made familiar with the idea as lying within the range of practicable municipal politics. Hence, though the petition may be rejected, it marks a step in advance. The idea has been put before the ratepayer, and he is looking at it.

Not much has been gained by the production in English of the German one-act drama "Adelaïde"—a poor, feeble thing, only remarkable for the bold idea of making Beethoven one of the characters. I did not expect that an artist like Mr. Bispham would consent to represent the great master, between whom and a counterfeit of any sort there is a great gulf fixed which no fancy or skill can bridge.

At the moment of writing, the subscription for the benefit of Mr. Sims Reeves does not make much headway. Men act naturally, no doubt, when they say that Mr. Reeves, in his long years of prosperity, should have made provision for old age and safeguarded it in every possible way. That, of course, would have been prudent, but artists are rarely endowed with worldly wisdom. It is not in their temperament. Besides, if we limit our help to those who have done nothing inconsistent with due provision against need, we shall never assist anybody, and some otherwise excellent people will starve.

It is not at all surprising that Mr. J. Duchscherer, of Exmouth, wanting instrumental performers, should advertise for them in the journals of his own happy Fatherland. Mr. Duchscherer called for "a good first violin, bass, flute, trombone, and side drum," offering them a permanent post. But, while favouring his own countrymen as players, he paid England the high compliment of adding: "Only good, moral young musicians need apply."

Apparently the good folk in South Wales are not so familiar with musical distinctions as some others. An evening journal having to state that a certain performance was conducted by Mr. J. T. Rees, Mus. Bac., of Aberystwith, told its readers that "the conductors were Mr. J. T. Rees and Miss Buck (Aberystwith)." Seeing this, another evening paper, on the opposite side of politics, playfully remarked: "To construe 'Mus. Bac.' into 'Miss Buck' is not so radically bad as to become unpardonable. They might have made it 'moist back,' or 'mist bag,' or 'moss bug,' and then the irate bachelor might have assailed them with a coal-hammer." A coal-hammer, after all, is a lighter weapon than this humour.

So the Royal Carl Rosa Opera Company has determined to wind itself up and have done with losses. I do not wonder. Last season's operations resulted in a deficit of £6,600, and no Company can stand that, coming, as it does, on the top of other disasters. The result is one more demonstration of the fact that we English care very little about opera—so little that even when a manager gives good performances of works supposed to be popular, at popular prices, in a large number of our big towns, we leave him in the lurch. It is said that the name, goodwill, and material of the company will be taken over by another enterprise. I hope so, but in that case it will be necessary for the impresario to keep down expenses and perform works which will give pleasure to the average man out of the street. In the matter of expense, I fear the Carl Rosa artists killed the goose that laid the golden eggs by demanding salaries out of all proportion to the means available. Not a few musical concerns suffer through that great and growing evil.

Mr. Frederic Archer writes to me from Pittsburg, U.S.A.: "I saw in a recent issue of The Musical Times a note to the effect that I am about to leave this 'smoky city.' The report probably came from some Spanish source, as it is utterly devoid of truth. I have ceased to wander; I came here with the fixed intention of remaining; my work is entirely congenial, and the position in all respects most desirable. If, therefore, you will kindly correct the statement, I shall feel greatly obliged." I correct it gladly; congratulating my old friend upon his fortunate circumstances, and Pittsburg upon having in its midst such a musical force.

I have seen a little book, entitled "Music, and do the English love it?" It is issued by the "Concorde Concert Control," which name I suppose represents a concert agency, and it is interleaved with advertisements—a terrible device which has, so far, kept me from giving the brochure the complete attention it, no doubt, deserves. I have, however, read as follows: "England, in the time of Field (the father of the nocturne), produced music that raised high expectations." Why Field, who spent most of his life in Russia, and is known as "Russian Field"? Again, it is said: "Troublous times, and the rigid Puritanical influence of Cromwell, seemed at one time to have almost stamped out music in England." This is hard on the Lord Protector, who, as a matter of fact, loved music well, and gave it a home in his palace of Whitehall. How difficult it is for prejudice and misrepresentation to die!

When these words appear, Bergen will be in full enjoyment of a musical festival connected with the International Fishery Exhibition in the far Northern town. The link between music and fish is not, perhaps, very obvious, but there must be one, since Shakespeare says that the lute of Orpheus could make "huge leviathans forsake unsounded deeps to dance on sands." All the Bergen performances are devoted to Norwegian music, the composers being Grieg, Selmar, Sinding, Schjelderup, Svendsen, Olsen, Holter, Cappelen, and Halvorsen. The orchestra is an importation from Amsterdam, "whilst the large choruses," quaintly says a circular in English, "will be sung by abt. 400 lady & gentleman singers." "There will be 6 conserts with 3 different programmes," adds the circular.

In addition to the notices of the performance of English music at Bologna referred to in our last issue, a Florentine musical journal, La Nuova Musica, gives a glowing account of the concert. The works performed were, it will be remembered, Stanford's "Irish" Symphony, Parry's Orchestral Variations, the Prelude to Sullivan's "Tempest" music, the Intermezzo in Mackenzie's "Rose of Sharon," and two Dances by Cowen. La Nuova Musica speaks in high appreciation of all these works, while, in its general remarks upon English music, it recalls the distinction gained in past times, and, as to the present, observes that if our composers are influenced by Mendelssohn and Brahms, it must be borne in mind that nearly all of them have been educated in Germany. The critic anticipates greater originality when young English musicians complete their studies in their own country, the characteristics of their nationality will more fully appear in their music. That is a very sensible observation.

BEETHOVEN AND HIS "TERMS."

Mr. J. Cuthbert Hadden has done an excellent piece of literary work in writing the biography of George Thomson, "the friend of Burns."* Thomson is best known South of the Tweed by his descendants. His daughter married George Hogarth, a former secretary of the Philharmonic Society, who was also the first musical critic of the Daily News, and a writer on music. Hogarth's daughter, Thomson's grand-daughter, Caroline, married Charles Dickens.

George Thomson (1757—1851), who held an official position in Edinburgh for fifty years, was an enthusiastic amateur. His place in musical history is that of the most persevering and successful collector of the melodies of Scotland, Wales, and Ireland, a work begun in his youth and continued for about forty years. Having collected the native airs from various sources, Thomson hit upon the original and bold idea of having special instrumental accompaniments written to the melodies. In addition to the pianoforte accompaniment, each song was to have a prelude and coda and ad libitum parts throughout for violin, or flute, or violoncello, the composition to be entrusted to none but composers of repute. The most distinguished of the musicians who responded to Thomson's invitation to co-operate with him in his work were Haydn and Beethoven. The sixty-three pages which Mr. Hadden devotes to "correspondence about the music" is a very valuable part of the biography, and cannot fail to be of great interest to musical readers. We propose to give a few extracts from the highly characteristic letters written to Thomson by Beethoven, especially as they show that Beethoven was by no means an "unbuttoned" sort of individual in regard to business matters—in fact, in this respect, he proved quite a match for the Scotchman, which is saying a great deal.

The originals of Beethoven's letters are in French. In transcribing the money references from Mr. Hadden's book, we have given only the English and not the Austrian values of the various amounts.

The first letter is not exclusively one of "terms," but gives the information that Beethoven had "a genuine liking for Scotch airs":—

Vienna, 5th October, 1803.

DEAR SIR,—I received with much pleasure your letter of the 5th July. I concur readily with your proposals, and beg to inform you that I am prepared to compose for you six sonatas of the kind you desire, introducing the Scotch airs in a manner which the Scottish nation will find in the highest degree favourable and in keeping with the genius of its songs. As to the remuneration, I think that £150 for the six sonatas will not be too much, seeing that in Germany I get that sum for the same number of sonatas, though in that case without accompaniment. At the same time, I must tell you that you will do well to come to an early decision, for so many engagements are being proposed to me that before very long I shall perhaps not be in a position to comply immediately with your request. . . . Having a genuine liking for Scotch airs, I shall take peculiar pleasure in the composition of these sonatas, and I venture to go the length of saying that, if the remuneration meets your views, you will be abundantly satisfied.—Yours, &c.,

LOUIS VAN BEETHOVEN.

The correspondence between Thomson and Beethoven, which seems to have been suspended for some time, was resumed in November, 1806, when the composer of the C minor Symphony wrote to "the friend of Burns," saying: "I shall use all the frankness and explicitness I myself like in business matters," and concluding thus:—

Lastly, as regards the remuneration, I understand that you offer me £100 in British money in cash, and not in notes of the Bank of Vienna, which, in the present crisis,* are too depreciated in value for that sum, paid in these notes, to be in the least proportionate to the work that I shall devote to you, and the remuneration that I receive for all my other compositions. In fact, the remuneration of £100 will not pay me too well for all that the satisfaction of your wishes entails.

Beethoven had evidently sounded Haydn as to his terms; he writes to Thomson:—

I am still willing to meet your wishes as regards harmonising some little Scotch airs, and I await on that matter a more explicit proposal, knowing, as I do, that Mr. Haydn has had £1 of British money for each air.

In the next extract Beethoven treats not only of "terms," but also of his "love for the glory of art":—

I will compose the ritornelli [i.e., the introductory and concluding symphonies] for the 43 little airs, but I ask £10 sterling more than you have offered; thus, instead of £50 I ask £60. This work is furthermore one that gives little pleasure to the artist; nevertheless, I shall always be ready to do it for you, knowing that it has some utility in a business point of view. As to the quintets and the three sonatas, I find the remuneration too little for me. I ask the sum of £120. You offered me £60, and it is impossible for me to give you satisfaction for such a remuneration (we are living here in a time when terribly high prices are asked for everything; we are paying about three times what we used to pay); but if you agree to the sum I ask, I will serve you with pleasure. . . . Be assured, sir, that you are dealing with a true artist, who loves to be honourably paid, but who has a still greater love for the glory of art, and who is never satisfied with himself, but is ever trying to take steps forward, and to make great and continual progress in his art.

. . . P.S.—Once again, I beg you to send me the words of the songs, as they are very necessary if one is to give the proper expression.

The next quoted letter speaks for itself:—

I have composed con amore, with the wish to give a mark of my esteem to the Scotch and English nation by doing homage to their national songs. . . . .

As regards the airs with English words, I will do them at a very low figure, to prove how ready I am to serve you: that is why I only ask £20 for these airs. I could not compose them at a lower figure without loss, for they give me here more for a dozen airs with German words, which give me no difficulty in respect of the language, whereas I have to get the English words translated, and to pay special heed to the pronunciation [? accent], and all that is a constant harassment.

Beethoven's comparison between Kozeluch and himself is amusing in its satirical reference to that composer. He writes:—

Haydn himself assures me that he has received £2 for each air, notwithstanding that he wrote for the harpsichord and violin alone, without either symphonies, or a part for the 'cello. As to M. Kozeluch, who gives you a song with accompaniment for £1, I offer my warm congratulations to you and the English and Scotch audiences when they hear it! I consider myself, I confess, a cut above M. Kozeluch (miserabilis!) at this sort of thing, and I do trust that you have some discrimination which will enable you to do me justice.

The following reference to Beethoven's proposed visit to England is interesting. Alas! he never came. Had he visited the "Land o' cakes" he might have anticipated Mendelssohn in composing a "Scotch" symphony:—

We want gold badly here, for our Empire is at the present moment a source of paper money only; and I, in particular, need it; for I may possibly leave this country and go to England, and then to Edinburgh in Scotland, where I should be delighted to make your personal acquaintance.

Beethoven's views on the "tinkering" of music might be laid to heart by sundry editors of his and other composers' works:—

I observe with much pleasure that the sixty-two airs I composed for you have at last reached you, and that you are satisfied with them, with the exception of the nine which you mark, and of which you wish me to alter the ritornelli and the accompaniments. I regret that I am unable to oblige you. I am not accustomed to tinker my compositions. I have never done so, being convinced of the truth that every partial modification alters the whole character of the composition. I am grieved that you are out of pocket through this, but you cannot lay the blame on me, for it was your business to make me more fully acquainted with the taste of your country and the meagre abilities of your performers.

Beethoven may well grumble at having to pay £60 per annum for taxes—"after the English fashion." He says:—

With respect to the six canzonettas which I am to compose, I confess that the honorarium you offer is totally inadequate. Circumstances here are much altered, and taxes have been so much raised—after the English fashion—that my share for 1814 was near £60; besides a good original air, and what you also wish, an overture, are perhaps the most difficult undertakings in musical composition. I therefore beg to state that my fee for six songs or airs must be £35. . . . You may depend that I shall do you justice. No artist of talent and merit will consider my demands extravagant.

* This, like similar references in subsequent letters, alludes to the hostilities with the French.

A fortune in his "Battle of Vittoria" is the optimistic tone of the next quotation:—

To attest our long-standing acquaintance, I offer you one of my works, on the Triumph of Wellington at the Battle of Vittoria, divided into two parts, first, the Battle; the second, Symphony of Triumph. The work, composed for full orchestra, was received with general applause in Vienna, and the common request is that it may be performed on the occasion of the visit of the allied sovereigns. The score is arranged for the pianoforte by myself. . . . The composition, which is dedicated to the Prince Regent of England, will not fail to make a fortune.

"Easy" versus "difficult" is amusingly discussed in the following letter, which is the last Beethoven wrote to Thomson. This letter—in which he fires a parting shot at the Scotchman—is, however, in Beethoven's best "unbuttoned" mood:—

My dear Friend.—You are always writing "easy," "very easy"; I do my best to satisfy you, but—but—but—the fee will have to be more "difficult," or, I might say, ponderous!!!!!!* . . . The fee for a theme with variations which I fixed in my last letter to you—not less than £5—is, I solemnly assure you, only so low out of mere favour to you; for I have no need of troubling myself with such trifling things; still, there is always some loss of time with such trifles, and honour does not allow me to tell anyone what I make out of them. I wish you may always have a real taste for true music; if you cry "easy," I shall retort with "difficult" for your "easy"!!!

Your friend,

Beethoven.

We trust that we have sufficiently sampled the excellences of Mr. Hadden's book to induce our readers to peruse the whole of his very readable biography of "George Thomson, the friend of Burns."

CHURCH MUSIC.

The musical arrangements at the funeral service of the late Mr. W. E. Gladstone were naturally regarded with much interest; and although there were many who thought, without knowledge of questions of room and convenience, that a complete orchestra should have been available, yet the exceptional group of instruments employed, under the direction of Sir Frederick Bridge and his able assistants, was found to be eminently satisfactory. It may be well to permanently record in these columns a list of the instruments. These were two trumpets, two horns, three trombones, one contra-bass trombone, and sundry instruments of percussion, with, of course, the organ in its king-like position of chief supporter of Church harmony. The combination of brass instruments is one well known in Church music and has often been referred to in these columns in this connection. Omitting the contra-bass trombone, a comparatively new and effective addition to the family, the group of instruments employed upon the solemn occasion now being referred to found its representation in the cornets, trumpets, and sacbuts of ancient days. This time-honoured combination remained the simple and noble orchestra of the Church for ages until organs became completely developed. Once more the old-world exponents of instrumental harmony are, by the rotatory force of time, to be frequently found in our churches, and composers have a new source of effective work before them by means of this revival.

The good people of Edinburgh are much attracted by the military services held from time to time in St. Giles's Cathedral. The music, "with trumpet and sound of cornet," is acknowledged to be noble and devotional in effect. "There is nothing new under the sun," and everywhere, even in Scotland, there are signs of a return to the ancient and impressive employment of wind instruments in service music.

The very interesting service lists of the important Church of the Incarnation, New York, again afford evidence of the earnestness with which Church music is cultivated and prized by our "kinsfolk across the sea." As already noticed, the list of composers of Church music includes the names of many well known modern writers, both English and American. On the other hand, the organ pieces—for by a sensible arrangement all the organ voluntaries find a place in the service lists—include a large admixture of works by the leading organists and composers of organ music of the modern French school, certainly the most favoured of national schools of music for the instrument at the present time. The work done reflects honour upon Mr. W. R. Hedden, the organist and choirmaster.

The London News, of Canada, gives an account of the repetition of Mr. T. Mee Pattison's oratorio "The Miracles of Christ," at the First Methodist Church in that place, on May 27, the work being heard with marked appreciation by a very large assembly of listeners. It is of interest to note that the music of the evening included four organ pieces, "Meditation," "Gavotte Moderne," "Seraph's Strain" and "Le Carillon," by those rising young English composers for the instrument, Messrs. E. d'Evry, E. H. Lemare, and Wolstenholme.

At a recent meeting in Birmingham of the institution known as the "Guild of Organists," the Bishop of Worcester expressed approval of the proposal of Mr. F. B. Townend, of Brentwood, in favour of Church organists being licensed as lay officers of the Church by the Bishops. The idea is not entirely new, as we believe some organists not unknown to fame have been so licensed in past years, as well as other Church musicians, in order to associate them with lay work in their own and other departments of the "business of the Church militant." As the Bishop of Worcester upon the occasion in question declared his "ignorance of the rudiments of music," it is clear the good prelate is not disposed to take any responsibility in connection with the professional and artistic status of organists applying for licenses as lay workers, and it is possible that most of our Bishops would be disinclined to accept such responsibility. The question would therefore arise, to what institution would the Bishops look to lead the way, by virtue of past work and prestige, in supplying organ players adequately tested with regard to their fitness to be licensed? We naturally opine that the Royal College of Organists would, in this connection, occupy a commanding position. However, the Bishop of Worcester felt with the Bishop of Chichester, who had been similarly approached, that the Bishops had already too much to do and could hardly be expected to add to their burdens; but the suggestion, he thought, seemed worthy of careful consideration.

* The original French of this passage is: "Vous écrivez toujours 'facile,' 'très facile'; Je m'accomode [sic] tout mon possible, mais—mais—mais—l'honoraire pourroit pourtant être plus difficile, ou plutôt pesante!!!!!!"

At the Evening Service on Whit-Sunday, at the Parish Church, Ealing, Sir Herbert Oakeley's Service in E flat and his fine anthem, "The Glory of Lebanon," were very effectively rendered. The composer conducted, and the able organist, Mr. Owen H. Mead, played the accompaniments with great efficiency.

In that glorious old building, the Collegiate Church of St. Saviour's, Southwark, the Diocesan Choral Society, under the direction of Dr. A. M. Richardson, the organist, held a Church Festival on May 26. The Canticles were Mr. Myles B. Foster's admirable setting in A, and the anthem was Dr. E. J. Hopkins's impressive work "Thy mercy, O Lord." Dr. F. G. Shinn gave an excellent organ recital before the service, one notable piece being Mr. Herbert Bunning's duet for violin and organ, composed for the occasion, in which Mr. Percy Sharman ably took part. Mr. C. H. Kempling gave valuable aid as the accompanist, and he also played the first movement of Guilmant's "First Sonata" as a Voluntary. The Service was in every way an impressive exposition of sacred art.

In an interesting paper read at the second annual re-union of the past choristers of Lichfield by Mr. J. B. Lott, the organist of the Cathedral, many particulars were presented which went to prove that not only our own, but the cathedrals throughout Europe have been during the past 300 years the leading schools for the production and early education of a large and important section of the "chief musicians" of the world. The many illustrious masters of old and the numerous eminent men of our own time who first studied music in the great churches abundantly prove how greatly cathedral training affects for good the after-life of our talented choristers. This fact more than justifies the efforts which are being made to advance the education and foster the musical taste of our cathedral choristers.

Dr. John Greig, an able and ingenious musician, who has recently left Edinburgh to take up his abode in London as the organist of the Scottish National Church, has composed a melologue, entitled "The Tear of Repentance," consisting of a recited narrative with incidental choral music. The work was given in his own church on the 17th ult.

An admirably conducted festival of the Nonconformist Choir Union, consisting of an interesting choir competition, a great concert in which four thousand singers took part, under the direction of Mr. E. Minshall, was held at the Crystal Palace on the 18th ult., and the presence of the admirable orchestra of the Union directed by Mr. T. R. Croger, not to mention an enormous assembly of thousands of persons interested in the proceedings, from all parts of the country, afforded abundant evidence of the remarkable progress Church music is making in the midst of the Nonconformist bodies at the present time; a movement calling for earnest encouragement and hearty approval.

A very pleasant ceremony took place at the Chapter House, Canterbury Cathedral, on the 8th ult., when Dr. William Henry Longhurst, the veteran honorary organist of the Cathedral, was presented with a testimonial consisting of a silver salver, an address, and a cheque for £117 7s. The Mayor of Canterbury, who presided, called special attention to the fact that Dr. Longhurst had served the Cathedral for the long period of seventy years, and also to the valuable services he had rendered to the cause of music in the city beyond the walls of the sacred edifice. In a speech, uttered with feelings of strong emotion, Dr. Longhurst tendered his sincere thanks to the kindness of his friends and to the Dean and Chapter for the very liberal grant they had made to him upon his retirement.

At the festival of St. Philip Neri, the music at the Oratory, South Kensington, was on the usual imposing lines, and was accompanied by an orchestra, under the direction of Mr. A. Barclay Jones, with Mr. Edward d'Evry at the organ. The Mass was Haydn's No. 6, and at the evening service Mozart's Vespers were given.

At the Parish Church, Blackburn, on the 5th ult., a Morning Service by the organist, Mr. J. H. Rooks, was sung. In the evening Sir George Martin's setting in G was given. Mr. J. Christopher Marks's anthem set to the hymn "The day is past and over" was a feature of the service. Mr. Rook's voluntaries included Dr. F. E. Gladstone's artistic and effective Organ Sonata and a movement by A. Mailly, the well-known professor of the organ at the Brussels Conservatoire.

The Gregorian Anniversary Service, held on the 2nd ult., as usual attracted an enormous congregation to St. Paul's Cathedral. Dr. C. Warwick Jordan was at the organ and Dr. Pearce was the conductor. A small band of wind instruments added much to the effect. Dr. Warwick Jordan's setting of the Old Hundredth Psalm was a marked feature of the fine service. At first sight such a work might not seem to come within the object range of the Gregorian Association; but from a broad and truly catholic point of view such a selection is in perfect keeping, the real object of the Association being the presentation of the "people's song," primarily that of the ancient Church, and, generally, that of all ages of the Church. Hence the Society may, with sound judgment, include all modern works based upon plain-song and choral themes, as in fit companionship with the presentation of the primitive chants, antiphons, and hymns of ancient Christendom.

ORGAN MUSIC.

Mr. W. E. Fairclough gave a recital in All Saints' Church, Toronto, Canada, on May 7. His pieces included Bach's Toccata in F, Mr. T. Tertius Noble's excellent and too rarely heard Theme with variations, and a "Marche de Fête," by a Mr. Reed.

During the course of the Third Triennial Festival of Church Workers at Gloucester, on the 2nd ult., and after Choral Evensong in the Cathedral, Mr. A. H. Brewer gave an interesting organ recital, the music including Mendelssohn's Sixth Sonata and the Finale from a Sonata in D minor by Dr. C. Harford-Lloyd. At the recital given by Mr. John E. West at St. Alban's, Holborn, on the 7th ult., the programme included Mendelssohn's Fourth Sonata, which the late Dr. Gauntlett prophesied when the work was first published, would be the most popular of the set; Wesley's beautiful Choral Song and Fugue, and the recitalist's own excellent Sketch in C minor. Dr. T. Ely gave a recital recently at Westborough Church (Unitarian), Scarborough, including in his programme that superb specimen of modern English organ music, Smart's "Air with variations and Finale Fugato," and movements by several representative French composers. On the 9th ult. Mr. Ernest Newton gave a recital at St. Thomas's Church, Portman Square, his scheme consisting entirely of specimens of the work of French and Belgian writers. Mr. H. F. Ellingford played, at St. Peter's-upon-Cornhill, on the 2nd ult., a selection, including the Introduction and Fugue forming the finale of Dr. Basil Harwood's Sonata in C sharp minor, and W. G. Wood's stately Toccata. Mr. Rudolph Loman's recent monthly recitals at the Dutch Church, Austin Friars, included, among other interesting works, Guilmant's fine "Theme with variations and Finale," several movements by Rheinberger, and the Sonata in D minor by A. Mailley.

That excellent performer, Mr. J. M. Preston, gave recitals at his own church, St. George's, Newcastle-on-Tyne, on the 5th and 12th ult. His programmes included Fantasia "Hanover" (E. H. Lemare), Berceuse (H. A. Wheeldon), Overture in C (A. Hollins), and the too rarely played Prelude and Fugue in F minor (J. S. Bach). Dr. E. J. Bellerby's recital at Holy Trinity Church, Margate, on the 14th ult., included the following pieces: Canzona (Wolstenholme), Andante Pastorale (Faulkes), and specimens of German, French, and Italian organ music.

The Rev. H. W. Clarke, in a crusade against the City churches, is sorely vexed with the mid-day organ recitals. He observes:—

> The organists urge on the work for the sake of advertising themselves on posters and in newspapers, as a means to get private pupils. Then professional solo singers are employed, and the cheap concert business has taken the place of prayers and preaching for the amusement of the City clerks when they are out for their mid-day luncheon. When the "concerts" are held, congregations varying from 130 to 300 can be attracted, whereas for prayers and preaching not more than two to a dozen can be got to attend.

Is it possible the last paragraph of this tirade partly reveals the sting of Mr. Clarke's animus against the ancient churches of the City? The words given recall the "Eyes and no eyes" story in that delightful book of the childhood of those who first knew the City two generations ago, "Evenings at Home." Perhaps Mr. Clarke should be reminded that a preliminary short form of service, often including an address, is the rule at the City mid-day musical services. The reverend gentleman has failed to recognise the happiness which is not his happiness: the delight of thousands of overworked frequenters of busy haunts in listening to the eloquence of grave and beautiful music amidst the quiet, calm precincts of our old City churches. With all reverence it may be added, "those who have ears to hear, let them hear." Such happy listeners will be quite willing to leave Mr. Clarke to his own devices, and more than contented to enjoy what he fails to appreciate.

At Holy Trinity Church, Richmond, on the 12th ult., Mr. G. Hardcastle played a selection of organ pieces, including Tours's highly effective Fantasia in C and G. A. Macfarren's Larghetto in A minor. Upon the same occasion, Mr. T. Curry, the Church organist, directed the performance, by the choir, of sundry anthems.

Mr. G. F. Andrews gave a recital recently at the Parish Church, High Wycombe. His selection included H. Smart's Postlude in D and other works in favour with the lovers of organ music.

The programme of Dr. A. P. Alderson's organ recital at All Saints' Church, Kingston, on the 22nd ult., included Bach's Prelude and Fugue in A minor, the Largo from Dvorák's Symphony "From the New World," and the Allegro con grazia from Tschaïkowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony. A violin and organ recital was given by Miss Margaret Standen and Mr. Joseph W. Burt, at the Abbey Church, Sherborne, on the 16th ult., when Mackenzie's "Benedictus" (violin) and G. E. Lyle's "Pastorale and Hymn of the Shepherds" (organ) were performed.

THE "ANTIGONE" AT BRADFIELD.

The Greek play at Bradfield is now becoming a regular institution. The "Antigone," "Agamemnon," and "Alcestis" having been produced in previous years, "Antigone" has now been repeated, and large audiences assembled to witness the performances. Some evidence of their popularity is afforded by the fact that it has been found necessary to provide five instead of three representations, and that the invitation list is fuller for each of the five than on other occasions. It must be very gratifying to the Warden of Bradfield, Dr. H. B. Gray (whose energy and resource shown in constructing the theatre, as well as his unwearied attention to every detail of the production, have been the chief factors in the success of the Bradfield plays), to feel that he has been able to create so widespread an interest in Greek tragedy. But it cannot be doubted that this increased popularity has its dangers; the Bradfield play would seem almost to have reached the stage which marked the Bayreuth festival of 1897, many of the guests attending more as a matter of fashion than because they took an intelligent interest in the spectacle presented to them. It is difficult to account in any other way for the behaviour of a considerable section of the Bradfield audience at the first performance, on the 20th ult., numbers of them going out during the progress of the action and disconcerting the actors by their indefensible discourtesy. Considering that the Warden had very properly inserted in the invitation form a request that none of the audience should leave their seats until the last choral ode was finished, this afforded an example of rudeness which is, we must fear, characteristically English.

The main features of the Bradfield plays are familiar from previous years; it is sufficient here to remind our readers that every attempt is made to reproduce, on a theatre especially constructed for the purpose, all the essential features of Greek tragedy. So far as one who is not an archæologist can judge, the whole seems to have been executed with very great care. It is true that the masks and high shoes were omitted, that the distinguishing features of the hyporchema were not marked, and that the commos was merely spoken, without paracatalogé; but these deviations were probably wise. A more serious departure from tradition lay in the fact that the principal women's parts were taken by ladies, for the first time at Bradfield. It might be argued that Greek tragedy cannot be said to be reproduced at all if a feature presumably so repugnant to the Greek mind is permitted to appear; many will think that the result is an impossible compromise, and that a frank modernisation would at least have the merit of consistency. But if anything could justify this non-Greek treatment, it would be the exceedingly fine rendering of the parts of Antigone by Mrs. H. B. Gray and of Ismene and Eurydice by Mrs. A. Bellin. Antigone is not an attractive heroine to a modern audience. Her feelings for Hæmon are indicated only in one line, the exact position and interpretation of which are matter of question; her attitude towards her sister, even when her evidence is saving that sister's life, has far more of contemptuous superiority than of affection; while her zeal for her brother's burial, which throws everything else into the background, is a point to which the modern spectator, while extending his sympathy, is unable to attach quite the same importance as did the Athenians. Mrs. Gray made the most of Antigone by bringing out with admirable emphasis the frequent allusions to Polynices; in lines 26, 46, 466, 513, and elsewhere, this feature was powerfully brought home to us; and if the well-known passage (456-7) suffered, as well-known passages frequently do, from too much stress being laid upon it, the whole of the splendid commos and the magnificent concluding passage (891 sqq.) were rendered in a way which can only be described as perfect. Mr. J. H. Vince was very successful as Creon. The part is difficult, as the king, after being brutal to Antigone and insulting to Teiresias, breaks down suddenly with a completeness which is surprising. Mr. Vince acted and declaimed well; in the early part of the play he was occasionally hampered by lapses of memory, but he rose to the occasion as the action proceeded, giving us the impression of a self-willed and rather pedantic ruler, in whom the honour of his country and the maintenance of law are more prominent than mere heartless cruelty. His character is not consistent, but Sophocles knew better than to make it so. The minor parts were rather less well filled, though none did badly, considering the difficulty of even the smallest characters in this most difficult play. The Sentinel, with his colloquialisms, is almost impossible to act; but he can hardly have been meant to be so rude to the king. Teiresias would, perhaps, have shown greater dignity if he had remained more quiet. Hæmon rather overacted, and uttered his "ironical" line (751) in a way which could imply nothing but a threat to Creon, the other and truer meaning of the words being positively excluded by this interpretation; towards the end the text was occasionally forgotten, but these slips were surprisingly few considering the disturbance created by the audience.

A word of praise is due to the Coryphæus, Mr. Pigott, both as leader of the chorus and as actor; in the latter capacity he delivered in admirable character those commonplaces which it is the general, though unsatisfactory, function of a Greek chorus to utter. The stage managing was good, though neither Ismene nor Hæmon appeared as soon as the chorus claimed to see them. A verse translation was provided by members of the Upper Sixth Form, in which the translators have endeavoured rather to give a readable version than to reproduce in English all the points of the Greek: the latter object would be hopeless in a rendering of the same length as the original. The choral passages reach on the whole a higher level than the iambic, the translations of Mr. G. S. Freeman showing considerable poetical feeling. In a very few cases the sense of the original appears to be missed (e.g., 457, 479, 1353).

The music for the performance, like that for "Alcestis" in 1895, had been specially composed for the occasion by Mr. Abdy Williams. As Mr. Williams explains in his preface, use has been made of the fresh light which has been thrown on Greek music by recent discoveries. Thus the major third, which had in 1895 to be considered as a doubtful concession to modern taste, may now be regarded as having been allowed at least occasionally in ancient accompaniment; while much interest was aroused by the new citharæ, produced by Messrs. Hill and Son under Mr. Williams's supervision. The flutes used were the same as those in 1895, made on the model of the Pompeii instruments. They are, no doubt, difficult to play, even without the keys, and the executants, seeming to be rather afraid of them, added less colour to the choruses than might have been expected. It is much to be desired that Mr. Williams may be prevailed upon to publish his music to "Antigone." No more useful exercise could be provided for students of Greek music, as Mr. Williams's name is a guarantee for the archæological exactness of the reproduction. Not having had the advantage of seeing the score or of hearing more than one performance, we can only speak very doubtfully of its effect on a modern listener. The opening phrase of the second Stasimon, the conclusion of the Hyporchema, and the final song struck us as impressive features, while in the Parodos the rhythm was admirably marked; but the general result was somewhat monotonous. It was difficult to detect much difference in the character of setting adopted for the several choral odes, although the variety in the style of the poetry is so great that the music must have been different in a proportionate degree. The members of the chorus worked well, though the rhythm was sometimes too much for them; their intonation was good and their evolutions were successfully managed. But we cannot believe that the effect produced on us by Mr. Williams's music is at all like the effect produced on an Athenian audience by their composers; and however subordinate the music may have been to the text (is not one passage of Plutarch sometimes pressed to mean rather more than it can bear?), it must have indicated clearly the character and substance of the words. As a student of Greek music, Mr. Williams deserves our warmest thanks, for not all musicians would consent to adopt the attitude of self-abnegation necessitated by this style of composition; but while we can partially realise the effect produced by the actors at Athens, we are much less able, even with Mr. Williams's help, to appreciate the music.

THE "NIBELUNGEN RING."

EVERYTHING comes to London, and the attempt to bring Bayreuth to Bow Street will form the most memorable event in the summer season of 1898. It may be remembered that the gigantic work, which was originally produced at the Festspielhaus in 1876, was first performed in the metropolis, at Her Majesty's Theatre in the Haymarket, six years later, under the direction of the late Anton Seidl. Since that date other performances have taken place as well as many of the two intermediate sections; but this year we were told that the work would be given in its entirety, and as nearly as possible under the conditions which exist at Bayreuth.

The first cycle of the three to be presented was commenced on the 6th ult., and the opening of "Das Rheingold" raised great expectations. The impressive prelude, so suggestive of the surging depths of the Rhine, was played in a manner that showed Herr Mottl had complete command of his orchestra, and that that orchestra, if somewhat weak with regard to the abilities of some of the string players, was a very capable body. When the curtain rose, the illusion of the floating Rhine Nymphs was admirably carried out, and their parts were most effectively sung by Fräulein von Artner, Fräulein Hieser, and Frau Schumann-Heink, their singing being the more praiseworthy owing to their unstable positions. It must require no little practice and strong-headedness to render such part-music while suspended on wires, and swung about at the poetic promptings of stage carpenters. Truly Wagnerian training is comprehensive. The amphibious Alberich was well impersonated by Herr Nebe, and the only mishap was that the gold became effulgent too late. The next scenes were scarcely so satisfactorily managed, and the limited capacities of the mechanical devices at Covent Garden became very apparent before the close of the evening. The Giants were decidedly disappointing in appearance, and Fafner so vocally. Herr van Rooy's embodiment of Wotan, however, went far to make amends for their deficiencies. He not only looked the part in perfection, but the timbre of his voice, the dignified gestures, and dramatic power of expression enabled him to convert the "Prince of Bores" into an attractive mythological deity. M. van Dyck's personation of Loge was also a striking performance, and he was so vivacious as the fire god that one forgave him when his singing suggested that the orchestra were playing in the wrong key. Miss Marie Brema was excellent as Fricka, and Fräulein Weed as the goddess of love in a singularly unlovely attire, but in accordance with Bayreuth, did fairly well. Frau Schumann-Heink sang magnificently as Erda, and the characters of Donner, Froh, and Mime were capably sustained by M. Dufranne, Herr Dippel, and Herr Breuer.

"Die Walküre" was mounted on the 8th ult. and commenced at five o'clock, with all the parts of the house well filled, save the grand tier of boxes, very few of which were occupied before the conventional hour. Much interest was attached to the first appearance of Madame Emma Eames as Sieglinde. This artist forsook what may be termed the hearth-rug costume in favour of an attire which was distinctly more becoming, although suggestive of fashions being studied in those remote ages. Her gestures were sometimes deficient in spontaneity, but the beauty of her voice and the exquisite finish of her singing imparted rare charm to the scene between the twins, and especially to the great love duet, in which Siegmund was personated by M. van Dyck, who acted very finely and who was in better voice than in "Das Rheingold." Miss Marie Brema is seen at her best as Brünnhilde, and was especially so on this occasion. Frau Schumann-Heink, appropriately and matrimonially insistent as Fricka, was very welcome to the audience, if not so to Wotan, who was again personated by Herr van Rooy with magnificent impressiveness. Nothing finer, indeed, has been heard on the operatic stage of Covent Garden than his delivery of Wotan's long drawn out autobiography. Wotan's wrath in the scene with the Walküren and his condemnation of Brünnhilde were also superbly expressed, and the pathetic music of the last act was most touchingly interpreted. The animated and exuberant conversation of Wotan's daughters, as they assemble, has seldom been more effectively given, but the scenic effects again fell short. The aerial arrival of the damsels was better done than on former occasions, but the rushing clouds which contribute in no slight degree to the turbulence of the scene were represented by an immovable cloth, and the mist which comes down at the fight between Hunding and Siegmund seemed to have got so badly congealed that very little of the conflict could be seen. The orchestral portion, however, went better than at the previous performance, doubtless owing to the players' greater familiarity with this section, and on the whole the performance was the finest that had been given in London.

"Siegfried" was performed the next afternoon at five o'clock, with M. Jean de Reszke in the title-rôle. As before, it was delightful to listen to the Polish tenor's singing of the exuberant music of the fearless hero; but the embodiment was less satisfactory than formerly in alertness, and in the inconsequent actions inseparable from vigorous youth. Artistically it was a mistake for the part of Wotan to be taken from Herr van Rooy and given to M. Edouard de Reszke. A still greater error was committed in Brünnhilde being personated by Madame Nordica in place of Miss Marie Brema. To see Miss Marie Brema put to sleep as Brünnhilde, and Brünnhilde arise in the person of Madame Nordica, is disturbing to the imaginative faculties, and, indeed, it is highly desirable that, when the "Ring" is done in its entirety, the characters should throughout be personated by the same artists; but the most unfortunate error that the management made was to allow a number of "cuts" to be made, which aroused the mythological wrath of the worshippers of Bayreuth. The half-man, half-monkey-like Mime was cleverly represented by Herr Breuer, although he at times was rather inclined to overact the part; but this was balanced by Madame Nordica's want of realisation of the character of Brünnhilde. She, indeed, treated the final scene more in the spirit of grand opera than that of Bayreuth, and more often took the audience into her confidence than Siegfried. Fräulein von Artner sang the bird-music admirably, Frau Schumann-Heink was again most impressive as Erda, and Alberich and Fafner were ably impersonated by Herr Nebe and Herr Wittekopf.

"Götterdämmerung" was commenced at four o'clock on the following Saturday, and the inability of M. Jean de Reszke to appear as Siegfried was a great disappointment. His place was taken by Herr Dippel, who acquitted himself of his arduous task with distinction and considerable success; but the smallness of his stature and limited power of his voice were accentuated by inevitable comparison with his predecessor in the character. Brünnhilde was again embodied by Madame Nordica, who, as in Siegfried, sang very finely, but failed to fulfil the traditional reading of the part. Madame Saville was very acceptable as Gutrune, and the minor female parts were satisfactorily sustained by Frau Schumann-Heink, Fräulein von Artner, Fräulein Hieser, and Miss Meisslinger. M. Edouard de Reszke was excellent as Hagen, Herr von Milde was a capable Gunther, and Herr Nebe appeared as Alberich. The orchestra was not quite so satisfactory on this occasion, one or two slips occurred, and the magnificent orchestral music at the death of Siegfried did not create the impression that was expected. The effect was also marred by the hero being carried out on what seemed to be one of the stretchers used for the conveyance of flower pots in the neighbouring market instead of on his shield as directed. Stage mismanagement was also responsible for several other disturbing influences. Gutrune's scream at the sight of the dead body of Siegfried was apparently mistaken for the whistle which signals the change of scenery, and literally brought down the house, causing the abode of Hagen to be lowered, as it should be at the close, to represent the rising of the Rhine. One of the prophetic ravens declined to fly off with its message, and when finally induced to do so, insisted upon traversing space upside down. The stage mists were also badly worked. Wagner is partial to mists, but a mist that comes down at the rate of forty miles an hour and at once shuts out the scene possesses no mysticism. These matters may seem to be trifles, but such things often caused the crossing of the line which divides the sublime from the ridiculous, and not infrequently robbed the finest climaxes of their crowning effect.

ROYAL OPERA, COVENT GARDEN.

WAGNER has absorbed so much of the operatic season that there are few other performances to chronicle. There are some, however, that call for record. Boito's unequal, but fascinating "Mefistofele" was mounted on May 26, under the conductorship of Signor Mancinelli, the occasion acquiring more than usual attraction by Madame Calvé sustaining, for the first time in England, the rôles of Margherita and Elena. Her embodiment of the former character was charming, the music was exquisitely sung, and the prison scene was given with rare dramatic intensity. The part of Elena provided less opportunities, but much individuality was imparted to it. Miss Meisslinger appeared as Marta and Pantalis, M. Bonnard as Faust, and M. Plançon as Mefistofele.

Concerning Madame Calvé's personation of Carmen, on May 31, in Bizet's brilliant opera, little more need be said than that it was distinguished by still greater subtleties of gesture and finish than before, and that it remains to-day pre-eminently the finest embodiment of the part. The other principal characters were sustained by Miss Marie Engle, M. Bonnard, M. Renaud, and M. Gilibert. M. Flon conducted.

A large audience was attracted, on the 1st ult., by the appearances of Madame Emma Eames, Madame Nordica, and Mdlle. Zelie de Lussan in Mozart's "Le Nozze di Figaro." The three prime donne respectively personated the Countess, Susanne, and Cherubino, and a vivacious Figaro was provided in M. Soulacroix; but although the music was finely sung, the interpretation of the work in its entirety was somewhat dull. Its humour seemed lost in the importance of its exponents. Signor Randegger wielded the baton.

On the 3rd ult. Madame Ternina made her début in London as Isolde in Wagner's "Tristan," and proved that her great reputation as a Wagnerian artist of the first rank is well deserved. Much of her success is due to her great abilities as an actress, which imparts rare expressive power to the beauty of her voice, and the great duet in the second act, with M. Jean de Reszke as Tristan, has never been more finely interpreted. Herr Zumpe was more successful in his direction of the orchestra than in his previous efforts.

The much anticipated first appearance in England of Madame Calvé, as Marguerite in Gounod's "Faust," took place on the 16th ult., and fully realised expectations. The reading is, perhaps, more French than German; but a more thoroughly youthful Marguerite in the earlier scenes, and so intensely tragic an embodiment in the later acts have never been seen. To those familiar with the traditional "business" of the part, the presentation was delightfully fresh, and it afforded a striking proof of the extraordinary versatility of this gifted artist. There were also other commendable features of the performance which merit record. M. Edouard de Reszke in the church scene remained behind the pillar and refrained from assuming the grotesque crouch of a gloating vampire over the prostrate form of Marguerite, and M. Renaud, as Valentine, gave up, in his death scene, the conventional and unpleasant procedure of alternately kissing his sword-hilt presented as a cross, and cursing his sister. Such advance in perception of the appropriate deserves encouragement. M. Saléza appeared as Faust and Miss Margaret Reid as Siebel.

The revival of Ambroise Thomas's "Hamlet," on the 22nd ult., which was last heard at Covent Garden Theatre in 1890, provided another opportunity for the display of Madame Calvé's remarkable talents. Although less distinctive than most of her impersonations, her Ophelia was delightfully natural and always charming; this criticism being as true of her singing as her acting. Her "make-up" was an artistic triumph, and contributed not a little to the fascination of her personation. M. Renaud was excellent in the title-rôle, and Mdlle Pacary sang well as Gertrude. The parts of the King, Laertes, and the Ghost were respectively sustained by MM. Plançon, Bonnard, and Journet. M. Fron conducted.

THE autograph MSS. of two hitherto unknown concert arias by Mozart were sold last month at Berlin to a Viennese amateur for the sum of £490.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

No novelty was introduced on May 26, and we can therefore dismiss the fifth concert with the statement that Herr Moritz Moszkowski conducted a finished performance of his charmingly melodious, elegant, and fascinating Orchestral Suite in F (Op. 39), composed for the Society in 1886, and was once again acclaimed by a typical Philharmonic audience an ever-welcome ravisher of their senses; that Miss Ella Pancera played Schumann's Pianoforte Concerto with brilliant technique and true insight into its poetic significance; that Miss Giulia Ravogli sang the beautiful "Inflammatus" from Dvorák's masterpiece, the "Stabat Mater," and Sir Alexander Mackenzie conducted Beethoven's Second Symphony with customary success.

The sixth concert, on the 9th ult., was more or less a d'Albert concert, for not only did our great pianist play the greatest of all pianoforte concertos, Beethoven's E flat, but he conducted his own Symphony in F (Op. 4) and a brand new scena, "The little Mermaid's death and transfiguration," in which his wife, Frau Hermine d'Albert, made her first appearance in England and proved herself an excellent singer who combines a sympathetic, though not very powerful voice of good quality with a good method and an emotional but refined style. We confess we are getting a little tired of operatic or quasi-operatic transfiguration scenes with obbligato transfiguration orchestral effects, though it must be conceded that Mr. d'Albert has managed to be fairly unconventional in the instrumental throbbings that accompany his little heroine to "Heaven's threshold gleaming bright." His scena is based on a fairy tale of Hans Andersen, and deals with a luckless mermaid who has foolishly and hopelessly fallen in love with a real live king's son, who, in his turn, loves, and, alas! weds another, who is not even a mermaid, but merely an ordinary human "Königsbraut." Heine's famous "alte Geschichte" over again, in fact. This undoes the little mermaid, for it means her death, she having for the love of him given up her natural element, to which she can only return as foam on the waves. But the strength of her unconquerable love "converts destruction into re-birth and she feels herself, transfigured into a Spirit of the Air, rising out of the sea to heights where the Love Eternal does not leave unsatisfied her longing for union with the community of the Blessed." This has been turned by James Grun into very Wagnerian alliterative but musical and music-inviting verse, and by Mr. d'Albert into equally Wagnerian music. We do not mean to suggest that he has plagiarised the master, but that he has taken for his model Wagner's third style, with its melodious and polyphonically accompanied recitative rising as occasion demands to the height of dramatic intensity and even beyond to the broadly tuneful, impassioned strains suggestive of ecstatic expression. There is not much of the latter in Mr. d'Albert's work—in fact, when he rouses himself for a great effort he is unconvincing and fails to carry us along with him. But the quiet opening of his lengthy scena abounds in beautiful touches, especially in the voice part, which is poetically conceived and unaffectedly pathetic. For its sake we gladly forgive the composer the occasional torture inflicted upon our ears by some shockingly inharmonious progressions in the intricate and highly-coloured orchestral accompaniments. His juvenile symphony, composed in 1885, is one of those distressingly ambitious, elaborate, and "profound" works which gifted young composers will perpetrate when they are beginning to feel their feet, and, taking their art and themselves dreadfully serious, feel "called" to write a really great work ("so 'ne rechte Jupiter," as Schumann said of his own C major Symphony), and straightway proceed to show how very little individuality they have developed in their few years of apprenticeship. It is well that these glorious times of fiery enthusiasm should come to young composers, albeit the offspring of their exaltation be doomed to failure or even absolute still-birth. Mr. d'Albert's symphony is scarcely an exception to the rule, but it is more than commonly clever and in parts comes sufficiently near real beauty and impressiveness to deserve a hearing. Yet on the whole it must be voted a dull effort in the Beethoven-Schumann-Brahms style. Except in the very lively and effective Scherzo, there is little spontaneity of melodic [illegible], and the many and varied devices of harmony, counterpoint, imitation, canon, &c., though they compel our dutiful admiration, do not assist us in getting over a feeling that this is essentially "made" music; nor does the very heavy and ineffective orchestration suggest anything else but book-learning. Mr. d'Albert's effects look very fine on paper, but, to use an expressive colloquialism, they "don't come off." Such scoring will not do in these days of Richard Strauss, Rimsky Korsakow, Glazounow, and Edward Elgar, and we feel sure that Eugene d'Albert himself will give us no more in future. Two sprightly songs from his pen were charmingly sung by his wife, and his performance of Beethoven's Concerto, though not equal to his best (what other great pianist would consent to play such a titanic work after conducting two long works lasting over an hour?), was sufficiently wonderful to rouse the audience to enthusiasm. Sir Alexander Mackenzie conducted excellent performances of Schumann's "Genoveva" Overture and the melodically and rhythmically original Prelude to Act III. of his opera "The Troubadour."

The personal element was again to the fore at the concluding concert of the season, which took place on the 23rd ult., when the chief part of the programme was occupied by the music of Dr. Saint-Saëns, by whom it was conducted. The versatile French musician also played on the great organ his comparatively recent composition for that instrument, a Fantasia in D flat (Op. 101), a piece conceived in sympathy with the genius of the organ, but somewhat vague in purpose. The work was followed by his setting of Victor Hugo's tragic ballad "La Fiancée du Timbalier," the solo part of which was sung by Madame Blanche Marchesi, whose command of tone-colour went far to make up for her deficiency in vocal power. It would have been more interesting had the French musician chosen to conduct one or two of his symphonic poems instead of his early Symphony in A minor (Op. 55). The work is written for the Haydn-Mozart orchestra, with only two horns, no trombones, and no percussive instruments save the tympani. The nerves of the dying century are scarcely to be stirred by such a "classic equipment," especially as the themes and their treatment in the first two movements appear to have been dictated by the shades of Mozart and Beethoven. The Scherzo is bright, and so pleased the composer that he conceived the applause which followed to express the desire of the audience to hear it again, and so promptly repeated it. When composers are so oblivious to continuity and balance, criticism has no word. The Finale is Mendelssohnian in character and shows the influence of his "fairy" music. Sir Alexander Mackenzie, who had opened the evening with an effective rendering of Sir Arthur Sullivan's "Macbeth" Overture, resumed the baton with Dr. Max Bruch's "Scotch" Fantasia for violin and orchestra, the solo part of which was interpreted by Mr. Timothy Adamowski with a pure silvery tone and a style in which dignity and brilliancy were happily blended. Weber's "Jubilee" Overture had presumably been chosen to conclude the evening because of its introduction of our National Anthem. May we venture to express a hope that, before the announced autumn series of concerts is begun, the presiding bust of Beethoven will be made more presentable?

RICHTER CONCERTS.

We fear Herr Robert Fuchs's Overture to the Austrian poet, Grillparzer's, drama "Des Meeres und der Liebe Wellen," produced by Dr. Hans Richter at his second concert at St. James's Hall, on the 4th ult., will not prove an addition to the list of great masterpieces amongst overtures. If, to quote the excellent analyst, "C. A. B.," it has been the composer's aim to describe the fierce love of the two protagonists of the drama, Hero and Leander, and the former's inconsolable grief over Leander's death, it must be owned that his strains fail to suggest any fierceness in the unhappy lovers' passion, or any great depth in Hero's grief over Leander's fate. Herr Fuchs has written a serious and pleasing overture, chiefly remarkable for unaffected tunefulness, an agreeable directness and artistic restraint in producing his effects, as well as for excellent workmanship. But he does not once strike the note of tragedy. Largeness of utterance and epic grandeur are not given to him; nor can he with all his hubbub in the orchestra make us feel that this is one of the world's most touching and most cherished tragedies which he is endeavouring to describe in the language of tones. His love-music is eminently respectable, eminently suggestive of a dangerous flirtation ("pleasant hours," the analyst has it) rather than the consuming passion that caused Leander nightly to swim the Hellespont. Such love Wagner might have dared to portray, and he would have succeeded, for he was never greater than when attempting the seemingly impossible. But Herr Fuchs has not at his command the first requisite of the musical tragedian—the faculty of inventing melodies that shall touch us to the quick as no spoken or written words can. The overture was beautifully played, but only coolly received. Dr. Richter had a surprise the reverse of pleasing in store for his audience in his performance of Tschaïkowsky's "Casse Noisette" Suite, which lost a vast deal of its esprit and daintiness through the leisurely tempi adopted for most of the movements and the want of that rhythmic accuracy and strictest attention to every smallest detail without which this exquisitely artistic bric-à-brac music almost loses its raison d'être. The Trépac, on the other hand, he took at a breakneck speed, which, in the place where we sat, completely obscured the melody. Needless to say he was himself again in the "Parsifal" Prelude (a wonderful performance) and Dvorák's E minor Symphony (No. 5), that delightful specimen of a born musician in his frankest, most spontaneous mood, when, rather than try to write what we might call "problem" music, he seems to pour forth an inexhaustible stream of melody of various degrees of beauty without the least apparent effort and almost in spite of himself. Signor Busoni evidently considers that, like Bret Harte's Caucasian, the pianoforte concerto is played out. So he brought forth—a rare practical joke—Schubert's "Wanderer" Fantasia as arranged and improved, with orchestral accompaniment, by Liszt, and Liszt's Spanish Rhapsody as arranged, and, we suppose, "improved," with orchestral accompaniment, by Busoni. He should know better, though in very truth no one could very well play these hybrid things better than he did.

At the following concert, on the 13th ult., poor Tschaïkowsky was yet once again made to perform his gruesome task of giving an enormous audience shivers of emotional excitement. "Pathetic" Symphony indeed! The barbarous doing to death of this splendid opus summum of the great Russian, and the consequent utter neglect of so many other masterpieces, form perhaps the gravest indictment which musical history can bring against the London concert managers of the end of this century. Not that we suppose those gentry feel any qualms at such a dreadful prospect! They will exploit Tschaïkowsky's very heart's blood and agony, so long as the public pay their silver pieces. Meanwhile, we begin to almost dislike the work and would as lief listen to the dullest symphony on record if it were only new! Dr. Richter's reading was not much more to our taste than M. Lamoureux's. He seems bent on introducing order and calm into that terrific first movement which so evidently suggests the chaotic state of a brain on fire. We greatly prefer Mr. Wood's reading, though nobody, in our opinion, has reproduced the spirit of the work better than Professor Stanford at the Royal College of Music, where the third and fourth performances in England took place. His fine reading (though he was necessarily somewhat handicapped by the inexperience of his juvenile players) should not be allowed to be forgotten. May we ask why Dr. Richter gave the last four notes for the bassoon in the Adagio mosso, just before the stupendous Allegro vivo, to another instrument? The passage can be played quite softly on the "loud" bassoon, for we have often heard it so played. And why should one of his wood-wind players be allowed to play the identical wrong note in the triplet passage of the moderato mosso which he played wrong last year? In the delicious 5-4 movement, Dr. Richter once more put down his baton, and at its conclusion went through his customary display of dumb show to convey his appreciation of his men's cleverness. The Finale was played with the intensest heart-moving expression. This, at any rate, was a great performance. Johann Svendsen's "Carneval in Paris" (Op. 9) is a brilliant jeu d'esprit, full of vivacious tune, tripping rhythms, unforced fun and gaiety, and bright colour. It was splendidly played, as were also the "Tannhäuser" Overture and Mozart's lovely "Haffner" Symphony (Köchel, No. 385), which probably gave many in the audience more genuine delight than all the rest of the programme. The conductor revelled in it and so did we.

Dr. Richter's last concert, on the 20th ult., was an emphatic declaration of his greatness. He was in his grandest mood, and secured performances of such magnificence that the voice of criticism is silenced, and hero worship and eulogy pure and simple may have their way. Whether the presence of Madame Cosima Wagner incited that venerable lady's friend to a supreme effort we know not, though it seems only natural. But this we know, that we have never heard Liszt's beautiful symphonic poem "Les Préludes" and the popular selection from Wagner's "Tristan" played so superbly. The latter especially was a matchless performance. Dr. Richter's crescendo leading to the fff in the Prelude was a veritable simoon of burning passion, his stupendous climax in the Finale the very acme of overwhelming pathos and delirious ecstasy. Were these the hackneyed "Vorspiel und Liebestod"? They seemed fresher, fairer, and greater than ever. Berlioz's brilliant and melodious "Carnaval Romain" Overture, Brahms's wonderfully impressive "Schicksalslied," and Beethoven's Choral Symphony, each in its turn, were interpreted in Dr. Richter's most elevated style. Here was a programme of great masterpieces, and such an one calls forth all those superb qualities by virtue of which he still remains the greatest living conductor. The choir, for whose benefit the French pitch was used, did well, considering the difficulty of their task, and Miss Fillunger and Miss Ada Crossley, Messrs. Edward Lloyd and Andrew Black formed an exceptionally fine solo quartet. Mr. Black may be specially commended for singing the opening bass solo with the joyous emphasis and spirit which it so emphatically demands. There was a crowded audience to enjoy and enthusiastically appreciate a great concert.

WAGNER CONCERTS.

Mr. Eugène d'Albert, the composer, has during the last month loomed large before the public gaze. We have heard several of his latest efforts, which is tantamount to saying that we know him now, at the age of thirty-four, in the prime of his early manhood, when a composer should show distinct signs of a style and individuality of his own. We can discover neither in Mr. d'Albert's recent utterances, by which we do not mean to imply that we consider him incapable of writing good or occasionally even beautiful music. But he seems so completely under the influence of Liszt and Wagner that we despair of his ever ranking as a genuine creator in the world of music and fulfilling the fair promise of his brilliant youth. Will he prove another disappointment of great hopes? We would fain think not, and yet we see in his latest works no signs from which we could recognise, ut ex pede Herculem, the presence of latent genius. Needless to add, we judge him by the highest standard; none other would suffice. The Prelude to Act II. of his opera "Gernot," produced by Herr Mottl at the concert of the 16th ult., begins bravely and brilliantly enough with a rush and a rouse, and there is much deserving of hearty praise in the exposition of his attractive subject-matter. But ere long we enter upon a maze of muddy polyphony which the orchestration, overloaded as it is with irritating, bewildering detail work, does nothing to elucidate. We cannot hear the music for notes, or see its outlines for colour. The cymbals struck with drumsticks, the tambourine and triangle, seem to cover everything as with a shimmering shroud, and, in despair, we abandon the hopeless task of following our clever composer's flight, or the equally hopeless endeavour to derive enjoyment from his complicated score. Herr Mottl secured admirable performances of Smetana's wholesome, merry, and sunshiny Overture to "The Bartered Bride," and the C minor Symphony (every composer writes or conceives a symphony in C minor, but we mean Beethoven's, of course), though in the first movement of the latter he seemed unable to infuse his own enthusiasm—we suppose his tremendous beat does signify enthusiasm?—into the orchestra. They seemed somewhat listless, and the movement suffered a little in consequence. The Finale, on the other hand, was a splendid achievement. The Verwandlungs-Musik and Graal Scene from "Parsifal" were played with all the awful solemnity, mysticism, and grandeur which Herr Mottl knows so well how to impart to it; and if the choir of boys and men were not irreproachable, either in their vocalisation or their German, and if they failed to enter into the spirit of the wonderful scene, allowance must be made for the difficulty of their task. Frau Schumann-Heink sang Schubert's great song "Die Allmacht" in superb style, with noble voice, deep feeling, and powerful declamation. Mr. Bispham, on the other hand, seemed overweighted in the long scena "Die Frist ist um," from Act I. of the "Flying Dutchman." To be sure, Herr Mottl hurled avalanches of brassy sounds at him; even Fafner the worm with his voice of metal could not have prevailed against these.

CRYSTAL PALACE CONCERTS.

Two influences dominated the programme of the festival concert which took place, on the 25th ult., at the Crystal Palace—the sixtieth anniversary of the coronation of the Queen and the re-appearance at Sydenham of Madame Patti. The first placed in the programme the National Anthem, "Rule, Britannia," Sir Arthur Sullivan's "Imperial" March, and Wagner's "Kaiser-Marsch," the last-named being supplied with lines having reference to the Queen, by Mr. W. Rawson, in place of those by Wagner. The audience was requested to join the choir in singing this new version, but it only rose to the occasion by getting on its feet. Madame Patti was in excellent voice and rendered familiar excerpts with great beauty of voice and consummate vocal art. The other vocalists were Miss Clara Butt, Mr. Edward Lloyd, and Mr. Santley, all of whom sang very finely. A word of praise also is due to Master F. H. Pedgrift for his excellent singing as the Youth in the selection from Mendelssohn's "Elijah." The sensational event of the afternoon was the performance of the "Dies Iræ" from Berlioz's "Requiem," which was heard under probably the nearest approach possible to the conditions demanded by the composer. The four brass bands blared from opposite points of the great orchestra, the sixteen kettle-drums and additional percussive instruments in a monster orchestra rattled and thundered, and three thousand voices declaimed the text; but when all were doing their best to drown each other the effect never approached the majesty and grandeur attained by Handel. The stupendous body of sound made the nerves tingle, but it left the mind unstirred. The most successful efforts of the choir were achieved in "Thanks be to God" from "Elijah," the "Chorus of Dervishes" (repeated), from Beethoven's "Ruins of Athens," and the Epilogue from Sir Arthur Sullivan's "Golden Legend," which were magnificently interpreted. Mr. Manns conducted. The attendance was 22,840.

SAVOY THEATRE.

"THE BEAUTY STONE."

THERE are some gems whose brilliancy depends more upon the workmanship that has been bestowed upon them than upon their intrinsic value, and of such is "The Beauty Stone," which was first presented to an expectant audience at the Savoy Theatre on May 28. Much was looked for from the collaboration of Messrs. A. W. Pinero and Comyns Carr and Sir Arthur Sullivan, and, be it added, no little was demanded by these gentlemen when they asked a Savoy audience to listen to a "Romantic Musical Drama" of serious design. In invoking the aid of the indispensable Devil of the Middle Ages, the authors provided opportunities for some grotesque whimsicalities; but Sir Arthur Sullivan has failed to impart to the music of this personage the individuality which marks his treatment of him in the "Golden Legend." The songs put into the mouth of the Devil are clever and they are orchestrated with consummate skill, particularly the one in which the history of "The Beauty Stone" is related; but they lack the touch of diablerie which would have given them distinction and identified them with the character. No modern composer can more happily express human sympathy, and the music written for the lame girl, Laine, possesses this priceless charm, particularly in the prayer to the Virgin. The other most memorable numbers occur in the part of Jacqueline, in her duet with the Devil, "My name is crazy Jacqueline," in which the composer harks back to the golden days of "Pinafore," and a dainty little ditty, "Ah, why dost thou sigh and moan." The songs of Saida, the mistress of the Lord of Mirlemonte, partake of grand opera in style, and several finely worked up concerted numbers have been written, notably at the end of the first act. In short, although expectation in some instances has been disappointed, the score contains very much that excites the admiration of the musician, and is worthy of Sir Arthur Sullivan's fame. The company were for the most part well chosen. Not even the Devil could alter Mr. Passmore's style; but, at any rate, Mr. Passmore is always welcome. Miss Ruth Vincent was a charming exponent of Laine; Miss Pauline Joran, as Saida, accentuated the grand opera element in her songs; Miss Rosina Brandram was as complete as usual in her impersonation of the blind girl's mother; and Miss Emmie Owen made a distinct advance in public favour by her vivacious embodiment of Jacqueline. The male parts were not so well served, Mr. Jones-Hewson as Simon being the most satisfactory. The mounting was in accordance with Savoy traditions and presented several most artistic stage pictures. Sir Arthur Sullivan conducted on the opening night, and, together with Messrs. Pinero and Comyns Carr, was called before the curtain and long and loudly applauded by the usual representative audience.

QUEEN'S HALL SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

THE two extra Symphony concerts at the Queen's Hall took place respectively on the 15th and 22nd ult. The programme of the former was devoted to the composer of the end of the century, Tschaïkowsky, and, it is scarcely necessary to say, included his "Pathetic" Symphony. Of the recent readings given of this work, that of Mr. Henry J. Wood is the finest, as most completely in sympathy with the spirit of the work. Nor is this astonishing. Mr. Wood has for years past identified himself with Slavonic music, with which his temperament would seem to be in entire accord, and no conductor has succeeded in so forcibly expressing the fierce and wild passion which surges like a mighty under-current in its strains, or in so brilliantly producing the barbaric glitter of its orchestration. With regard to the much debated subject of the Andante in the first movement, Mr. Wood adopts a happy middle course between the over-hurried passion of M. Lamoureux and the more tranquil expression of Dr. Richter. Under Mr. Wood's baton the beautiful melody seems to come into the turbulence of the struggle with fate like a treasured memory of a past ecstasy, and, in the second portion of the theme, to cry out with poignant grief bordering on despair in the conviction that that past will never return. This interpretation is chiefly secured by subtleties of tempo, varying but in slight degree from those of other conductors, but providing a reading that furnishes the required contrast to the storm and stress of the rest of the number, and gives consistency to the subsequent appearances of the subject. The exuberant, half-savage triumph of the martial third movement was also given with pulse-stirring intensity, and the whirl of the wonderful crescendo, which leads to the return of the principal theme, was worked up with startling force. The novelty of the afternoon was the first performance in England of the "Ouverture Triomphale" in D (Op. 15). Even the painstaking and widely-read Mr. Edgar F. Jacques has failed to discover the origin of this work, but he says: "Its Opus number suggests that it was written early in the seventies, as Tschaïkowsky's second Symphony (Op. 17) is stated by Kashkin to have been completed about the year 1872; and the fact that a phrase of the Russian National Hymn is mingled with the Danish melody seems to connect the work in some way with the union of the late Czar with the daughter of the King of Denmark, sister to our Princess of Wales." The respective National tunes are ingeniously treated, but the scoring is somewhat noisy, and in its entirety the work is inferior to the "Ouverture Solennelle, 1812," which was also played at this concert, and with which it has something in common, each being a pièce d'occasion and each containing references to the Russian National Anthem. Madame Carreno gave one of the most brilliant renderings of the solo part of the brilliant Pianoforte Concerto in B flat minor (Op. 23) that has been heard in this country; the fascinating "Nut-cracker" ballet suite was played to perfection, and Miss Clara Butt made a welcome re-appearance after her recent accident.

The "novelty" at the second concert was the first appearance in England of Mr. G. A. Van der Beeck, who, in spite of his name, was born at Islington, of ballad fame, in 1866. English art may surely be said to be "looking up" when concert agents draw attention to such a fact. Hitherto, however, Mr. Van der Beeck seems to have avoided his native hearth as much as possible and he has studied singing at Frankfort-on-Main. Hence, perhaps, his method is at present lacking in some essentials to success. He sings with his head inclined to his chest, and he has yet to acquire the art of making his voice travel; but the organ is of genuine tenor quality, and although his readings of "In fernem Land" (In distant land) from the third act of "Lohengrin" and of the Preislied from "Die Meistersinger" were somewhat cold, they were distinguished by an unpretentious and artistic style. The programme, being entirely composed of familiar excerpts from Wagner, does not call for detailed criticism; but it should be recorded that it was interpreted with a thorough comprehension of the music, subtlety of expression, delicacy, and power that proved there is no longer any necessity to import foreign conductors or instrumentalists to give the fullest expression to this master's works.

PETERBOROUGH MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

THE sixth of the Peterborough and Lincoln Festivals took place at Peterborough on the 14th ult. The scant opportunities for rehearsal, added to the difficulties of attracting a not too musical public by anything but the most familiar works, made it impossible to venture upon anything novel, so that no fault could be found with a programme that comprised Mendelssohn's "St. Paul"—which not a few regard as his finest choral work—Schubert's great Symphony in C, and a copious selection from Handel's "Messiah." Till the Eastern Counties see their way to support a more extensive scheme than is possible at a one day's festival, it is obviously unreasonable to look for any turning aside from well-worn paths.

So far as the chorus is concerned, there certainly seems to be some excellent material at hand for a choral festival. The Eastern Counties are not famous for the power or sonority of their voices, but by choosing a fairly wide area of selection, a chorus that was bright and pleasant in quality, remarkably even in balance, and keenly alive to the conductor's beat had been got together. The nucleus was, of course, the Cathedral choirs of Peterborough and Lincoln, to which were added contingents from Peterborough (Choral Society), Northampton, Leicester, Market Harborough, Kettering, &c., the aggregate numbering about 250 voices. Against these was pitted an orchestra of fifty, divided about equally between strings and wind. The result was, as may be anticipated, that the band, in spite of the ability of many of its individual members, was deficient in string tone, and not quite weighty enough in comparison with the chorus. Still, they gave by no means a contemptible rendering of the symphony. Probably no church in England lends itself more to orchestral music than does Peterborough Cathedral, where clearness is not at the expense of the general effect of the ensemble. The soloists were Miss Esther Palliser, Miss Adelaide Lambe, Mr. Branscombe, and Mr. Daniel Price, all of whom were thoroughly successful in both Handel and Mendelssohn, while for pure beauty of vocal effect Miss Palliser was, perhaps, the most distinguished of the quartet. In the "False Witnesses" duet Messrs. Smith and Stead were completely satisfactory. The chorus singing was, however, distinctly the chief feature of the festival, and from the opening chorus in "St. Paul" to the last cadence of Handel's "Amen" their attention never flagged; while such choruses as "Rise up, arise," "O great is the depth," and all of "The Messiah" choruses were sung with admirable brightness and point. The singers had certainly a great advantage in the clear and decided beat of Dr. Keeton, who was conductor of the festival. Dr. Bennett, of Lincoln, was organist, and considering the difficulties with which he had to contend—playing in a position where he could neither see the conductor nor realise the effect he was producing—carried out an exacting task very creditably. At the same time, it is probable that, with greater opportunities of full rehearsal, he would have found reason to modify some of his combinations, which were rather too strong for the relatively small band. It is this want of adequate preparation that is the bugbear of all festivals, and it is much to be hoped that means may be found to carry out a suggestion that next year's festival at Lincoln should be a two days' event. This will not only admit of an extra concert, at which secular music may be heard, but will give an opportunity for much more thorough rehearsal than is possible under present conditions.

LEEDS MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

THE Leeds Festival, which is fixed for the 5th to the 8th October, promises to be at least a great financial success. The full programme includes several additions since the first sketch programme was issued. Sir Arthur Sullivan has again been unable, through ill-health, to fulfil his promise of a new work; but a setting, by Mr. Cowen, of Collins's "Ode to the Passions" has been accepted in its stead. Another novelty is a short choral ode by Mr. Goldschmidt, which, it is understood, Sir Arthur Sullivan has strongly recommended. These, with the works specially written by Professor Stanford, Dr. Alan Gray, Mr. Elgar, and Mr. Humperdinck, will make an uncommon array of novelties, and give unwonted interest to the programme. New to the large majority of the audience will be the "Vätergruft" of Cornelius, a scena for bass soloist and chorus, and the "Naissance de Vénus" of Gabriel Fauré, a composer known in this country almost exclusively by his chamber music.

The choral rehearsals are progressing at the various centres in the West Riding where contingents are established. On the 18th ult. a full choral rehearsal was held at Leeds, at which Professor Stanford's Te Deum was practised under his conductorship. Without indulging in premature criticism, it may at any rate be said that the music was eminently vocal, and was sung with the greatest possible zest by the large chorus. A happy innovation was the introduction of a solo quartet of local vocalists, who not only gave a sense of completeness to the effect, but added to the efficiency of the rehearsal. Mr. Elgar is to come to Leeds on the 9th inst. to rehearse his "Caractacus," and on the 14th the hard-worked choirs are to begin a well-earned month's holiday.

MR. FREDERICK DAWSON'S CONCERT.

RE-APPEARANCE OF HERR KARL KLINDWORTH IN LONDON.

THE orchestral concert given on the 15th ult. by Mr. Frederick Dawson, at St. James's Hall, will be remembered by music-lovers not only because of the proof it afforded of his own satisfactory advance in his art, but by his engagement of Herr Karl Klindworth as conductor. Mr. Dawson has long given promise of attaining a very prominent position as a pianist, and he is fast approaching the time when he may claim to be placed in the foremost rank of modern executants. At present he is more successful in modern romantic music than in the classics. This was particularly shown at his concert by his respective readings of Beethoven's Concerto in E flat (Op. 73), acknowledged as the "Emperor" of its companions, and in Tschaïkowsky's example in like form in B flat minor (Op. 23). The interpretation of the former was deficient in depth of expression and breadth of phrasing, but the latter was played with a verve, brilliancy, and command of the keyboard which caused his listeners to recall him four times to the platform, and to demand, and of course obtain, the extra piece so dear to the heart of the thoughtless.

Herr Klindworth received a hearty welcome on his appearance on the platform, which may be attributed to the widespread appreciation in England of his masterlike arrangement for the pianoforte of the orchestral portion of "Der Ring des Nibelungen," and of his fine editions of Beethoven's sonatas and Chopin's compositions, especially the last-named, concerning which it may be remembered that Von Bülow wrote: "I know of two ways only to learn Chopin's works properly, the first is to hear the great master Franz Liszt play them; the second, to study them in Karl Klindworth's edition." Herr Klindworth was born in 1830, and he has not appeared in London since 1868; but whatever doubts may have existed concerning his abilities as a conductor were dismissed soon after Wagner's fine but gloomy "Faust" Overture had been commenced. It was manifest that the veteran musician had a fine perception of the subtleties of rhythm and attached great importance to phrasing, and this, combined with a rare faculty of bringing out detail, caused the interpretation of the overture to be singularly clear and impressive. Such were also the features of the performance of the Overture to Berlioz's opera "Benvenuto Cellini." The only other purely orchestral piece in a commendably short programme was Liszt's symphonic poem "Orphée," which was revived by Mr. Henry J. Wood at one of Mr. Robert Newman's Promenade concerts at the Queen's Hall on October 9, 1896, and is a fine example of Liszt's skill in orchestration.

MR. BISPHAM'S CONCERT.

Two New Songs by Beethoven.

The first performances in London of two songs by Beethoven gave distinction to Mr. Bispham's concert, on the 16th ult., at St. James's Hall. The first, a setting of Goethe's "Haidenröslein," has been arranged by the American composer and pianist, Mr. H. H. Huss, from a page of one of Beethoven's sketch-books, which contained the melody only; and the second is the completed sketch of a setting of the same poet's "Erl-King." The sketch consists of the vocal part with an occasional intimation of the accompaniment. These have been deftly used and augmented by Herr Becker, who has accomplished his delicate task with commendable discretion. Mr. Bispham sang the songs in his best style, but they are little likely to supersede the music fitted to the same words by Schubert. Other interesting lyrics were two songs by Hans Sommer, entitled "Herbst" ("Autumn") and "Am Waldteiche" ("An Adventure"), the former a dignified and expressive composition and the latter a clever setting of some amusing lines which are, however, marred by doggerel Latin. A new song of serious design called "Auferstehen" ("Resurrection"), by Mr. Georg Henschel, proved disappointing, and "Die drei Dörfer" ("The Three Villages"), by Adolf Jensen, is an example of heavy German humour that takes long to reveal itself. Settings by Mr. H. R. Shelley and Mr. Walter Damrosch of two of Mr. Rudyard Kipling's ballads, respectively entitled "Follow me 'ome" and "Danny Deever," proved amongst the most acceptable pieces of the afternoon, and were delivered with admirable point by the concert-giver. Some tastefully played violin solos, contributed by Miss Leonora Jackson, provided artistic variety.

PIANOFORTE RECITALS.

M. Vladimir de Pachmann's second and third pianoforte recitals took place respectively on the 1st and 18th ult., at St. James's Hall. The most important work at the former was Weber's Second Sonata in A flat (Op. 39), the prominent romantic element in which was made delightfully manifest. This and a Chopin selection formed the most memorable features of the afternoon. The programme on the 18th ult. was entirely devoted to Chopin, whose works M. Pachmann interprets with such fascinating delicacy and poetical suggestiveness. A beautiful rendering was given of the Sonata in B flat minor (Op. 35), and five of the "Preludes" and two of the "Studies" were played with exquisite touch and brilliancy. The reading of the "Fantaisie" in F minor (Op. 49) was less satisfactory; but atonement was made in the Ballade in G minor (Op. 23) and the Polonaise in A flat (Op. 53). As usual, M. de Pachmann frequently took liberties with the text, but he sins in so winning and apparently so helpless a manner that the pen of censure is stayed.

The two recitals given respectively on the 3rd and 10th ult., at St. James's Hall, by Mdlle. Ella Pancera, showed that this executant is making satisfactory progress. She is still more an executant than an interpreter of the music of the great masters, but now and again the spirit of the works she played was happily expressed.

Messrs. Ross and Moore gave distinction to their recital on the 6th ult., at St. James's Hall, by giving the first performance in London of the original version of Arensky's suite entitled "Silhouettes." Other pieces, played with delightful unanimity by these clever pianists, were Schumann's "Andante con variazioni" for two pianofortes, Sinding's "Variationen" in E flat minor, and Brahms's "Fünf Walzer."

Madame Carreno gave her second recital at St. James's Hall, on the 9th ult. She still occasionally indulges in fierce sforzandos, which are apparently the outcome of strong emotion that brooks no restraint, and there is little tenderness in her rendering of passages of gentle sentiment. But she is a fine exponent of music in sympathy with her temperament, and she infuses into her readings so much of her own individuality that her recitals are likely to always prove attractive.

Mr. Eugene d'Albert's programme, on the 13th ult., at St. James's Hall, may be said to have shown the development of the modern sonata. It began with Beethoven's in A flat (Op. 110), and was continued with Chopin's in B minor (Op. 58), Weber's in A flat (Op. 39), Liszt's in B minor, and Tschaïkowsky's in G (Op. 37). All these were rendered in a master-like manner, but the finest readings were those of Beethoven's and Liszt's works.

Mr. Georg Liebling concluded his series of ten recitals on the 24th ult., at St. James's Hall, with an interesting programme, that included a large number of clever vocal and instrumental pieces from his own pen. A new "Suite à la Watteau" (Op. 31) for pianoforte solo showed considerable fancy and charm.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

The orchestral concert given by the students of the Royal Academy of Music at St. James's Hall, on the 21st ult., afforded proof of the good training received at the Institute in a remarkable number of branches of musical art. Annie M. Hughes, the Erard centenary scholar, showed much skill as a harpist in Wilm's Concertstück in C minor (Op. 122), a melodious and somewhat elaborate piece in three movements; Leila Bull played the solo part of an Oboe Concertstück in F minor (Op. 33), by Rietz, with praiseworthy skill and intelligence; Edith Byford was heard in Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto; Vera Margolies rendered with a sympathetic touch the pianoforte part of the Larghetto and Allegro agitato, from Henselt's Concerto in F minor (Op. 16); and there were also included in the programme two movements from Dvorák's Violoncello Concerto in D minor (Op. 104), with Bertie Withers as the soloist. A pleasing feature in the afternoon was the admirable recitation, by Annie M. Child, of "Marguerite of France," furnished with orchestral accompaniment by A. von Ahn Carse, a student at the Academy. This music shows a lively fancy and promise, but it is in several places too heavily scored, and is often assertive rather than suggestive, with the result that the attention is distracted from the reciter and the text; but this is not astonishing, for to effectively illustrate spoken words without making the speaker indistinct is a task to tax the abilities of the matured musician. The female choir sang Schubert's settings of "The Lord is my Shepherd" and "God in Nature" with commendable precision and attention to light and shade, and Robert Radford and R. Whitworth Mitton respectively sang excerpts from Haydn's "Creation" and Wagner's "Die Meistersinger." A word of praise is due to the orchestra, which was conducted by Sir Alexander Mackenzie.

THE ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

THE College Students' Orchestra was in excellent form at the concert of the 7th ult., when the programme opened with the powerful and original Prelude to Sir Alexander Mackenzie's opera "Colomba." An expressive, sympathetic performance was given of this fine composition with its suggestive Leitmotiven, pregnant with the spirit of tragedy and revenge, and, in that beautiful sweeping final melody for the strings, of peace and prayerful aspiration. Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony went with all requisite abandon, while the delightful Chaconne and Rigodon by De Monsigny and Brahms's superb Variations on a theme by Haydn were also well played, though the latter work was a severe test of the young people's capacities. Maud Gay is generally called upon to perform the most unhackneyed of compositions for the pianoforte, and on this occasion was set down for M. Saint-Saëns's bizarre but interesting, and in places quite fascinating Fantasia "Africa," which she played with considerable brilliancy and commendable rhythmic accuracy; the orchestra doing full justice to the highly coloured and richly ornamented accompaniments. The composer, who was present, was enthusiastically called, and warmly shook the young player's hand. Muriel Foster essayed the weird recitative and air "Where shall I fly," from Handel's "Hercules." She is such an intelligent and gifted young artist, and we have so frequently praised her singing in terms of warmest approval, that we may, perhaps, warn her against the danger of sacrificing beauty of tone and accuracy of intonation for the sake of dramatic expression. In their laudable eagerness to "let themselves go," she and other young singers occasionally lose control over the management of their voices, and though they give us much fierce "passion," they are liable to miss the dividing line between what should be the musical utterances of a dramatic singer and the ranting of a second-rate reciter. By all means let our young singers be dramatic, but only if they can be so without becoming uncertain of their intonation and the production of their voices. Even Mime, Alberich, or Fafner should sing in tune and with perfect control over their "organs," though these need not be of first-rate quality. Miss Foster is one of our most promising young singers, and we hope she will not allow early honours to spoil her chances of enduring success in the future.

At the chamber concert on the 17th ult. Kitty Woolley and Florence Smith gave a "temperamentful" and technically well-rounded performance of the "Kreutzer" Sonata, while Wm. Read, Wilfred Mander, Edward Behr, and Robert Grimson played Beethoven's E flat String Quartet (Op. 74) in capital style, the Scherzo especially being given with much force and spirit. Annie Wilson was heard in two violoncello solos by Mendelssohn and Servais (not Popper for once!), to which she did much justice, and four of the youngest and smallest students, Tom Morris, Winifred Smith, and Helen Kelly, with little Papa Haydn Wood as "leader," played a most effective "Romance and Tarantelle" for four violins, by Hellmesberger (Op. 43), in really admirable fashion, every note being as true as a die, and the phrasing charmingly artistic, especially in the beautifully-written "Romance," where every violin in its turn has the theme, and many clever effects are produced by the composer's excellent disposition of the four instruments. Louisa Gibson sang Schubert's song "Memnon" expressively, though her German is as yet somewhat rudimentary; and Beatrice La Palme warbled two songs by Massenet and Tschaïkowsky very prettily. The latter was quite a "European concert" in itself, for here we had a German poem (Heine), set to Russian music, and sung in a French translation by a scholar in an English music school! Slightly mixed, this.

MR. FRANSELLA'S CONCERT.

A FLUTE QUARTET.

THE veteran joke about two flutes may be said to have been killed on the 6th ult., when Mr. Albert Fransella, assisted by Messrs. Victor Borlée, E. R. Hudson, and W. G. Smith, gave the first public performance on a quartet of flutes specially constructed for him by Messrs. Rudall Carte. In common with most novelties, the idea is very old, sets of flutes à bec being common in the Middle Ages. Prætorius mentions eight different sizes of flutes, but it is scarcely necessary to say that Mr. Fransella's instruments are very different from their progenitors. Mr. Fransella respectively styles them "F," "concert," "tenor," and "bass" flutes; but the appellation of the two last-named is misleading, the effect of the flutes when heard in combination resembling that produced by a female quartet, and the tenor and bass timbres being conspicuous by their absence. The tone produced, however, is very pure, that of the "bass" or "G" flute being peculiarly rich in quality. Mr. Fransella's party played with a finish and precision that made the performances most enjoyable. The novel quartet was first heard in an "Album leaf" and "Scherzetto" specially composed by Mr. T. H. Frewin, which proved not only admirably written pieces, but attractive examples of their class. Mr. Fransella also gave first performances of a Suite for flute and pianoforte by A. Cœdès-Mongin, and two brilliant flute pieces severally called "Val d'Hirondelle," by E. Köhler, and "Caprice Valsante," by A. W. Ketèlbey, and in all showed his perfect command of his instrument. A feature of the evening was the recitation of Bemberg's setting of "La Ballade du désespéré," the spoken part of which was given by Mr. Charles Fry with remarkable dramatic intensity of expression, and the voice part sung with notable clearness of articulation by Miss Mary Willis. The impressiveness of the piece was much increased by the "singing voice" and the instrumentalists, Miss Henriette Murkens, Mr. B. P. Parker, and Mr. Percy Pitt, being placed behind a screen. Other vocalists who contributed to the enjoyment of the evening were Miss Gertrude Drinkwater, Mr. Gwilym Richards, and Mr. Louis Frôlich.

THE FITZNER QUARTET.

THE two chamber concerts given in the past month, at the Queen's (Small) Hall, by the Fitzner Quartet, have deepened the favourable impression created by this party during its visit to the metropolis last year. At the first performance, which took place on the 13th ult., excellent interpretations were given of Dvorák's Quartet in F (Op. 96), in which negro minstrelsy may be said to appear in European dress, and Schumann's world-famed Pianoforte Quintet (Op. 44), the keyboard part in the latter work being well played by Miss Beatrice Hallett. A novelty in the programme was a violin solo with pianoforte accompaniment entitled "Aus der Heimat" (Home scene), by Smetana, a piece of some length and considerable musical interest, which was sympathetically rendered by Herr Rudolph Fitzner, the leader of the party.

At the second concert, on the 20th ult., attention was called to a suite, set forth as consisting of three movements, by Alexander Glazounoff. This, however, proved to be the Russian composer's Suite for strings (Op. 15), which consists of five numbers, severally headed "Alla Espagnola," "Orientale," "Interludium in Modo Antico," "Valse," and "Alla Ungherese." The last-named had been played by the Hillier Belgian String Quartet at Miss Rosa Green's concert at the Queen's (Small) Hall on April 5, 1897, but the first three movements, selected by the Fitzner Quartet, had not previously been heard in London. They are each more Slavonic in character than their respective titles would suggest, and the third savours of the music of the Greek Church. The other quartets were Mozart's in B minor (No. 22) and Brahms's in G minor (Op. 25), the pianoforte part in the latter being rendered by Miss Beatrice Hallett. Miss Adeline Temple sang at both concerts, but scarcely possessed sufficient vocal training to justify her being included in the scheme.

IMPERIAL INSTITUTE.

WHATEVER may be thought about the engagement of a foreign orchestra to beguile the hours of frequenters of the garden of the Imperial Institute, it must be admitted that Signor Campanari's programmes have been meritoriously eclective, and that on several occasions the works of English composers have been accorded recognition. The first part of the selection on the 4th ult. was entirely devoted to British writers and included Macfarren's bright "Chevy Chace" Overture, Mr. Edward German's ubiquitous and always welcome "Three Dances" from his incidental music to "Henry VIII.," the romantic Adagio from Mr. Frederic H. Cowen's "Scandinavian" Symphony, the "Yellow Jasmine" movement from the same composer's poetical suite "The Language of Flowers," and Mr. Arthur Hervey's "Dramatic" Overture. The last-named work deserves to be more often heard. Its poetic basis, the struggle between love and adverse fate, affords admirable opportunities for contrast, and these have been effectively taken advantage of, not only in the themes, but in the development, which fully justifies the descriptive appellation bestowed upon it by the composer. The work was originally produced at a concert given in November, 1890, by Señor Albeniz, and, two years later, it was played at one of the Saturday afternoon concerts at the Crystal Palace.

NONCONFORMIST CHOIR UNION.

THE utmost success attended the tenth annual festival of this Association at the Crystal Palace on the 18th ult. The singing in the usual competition for choirs of from twenty-six to forty voices, of which Dr. E. H. Turpin was the judge, was above the average, and the subsequent concert on the Handel orchestra proved in its executive details a still further improvement upon preceding years. The competition brought seven competitors, and of these the Littleborough Primitive Methodist Choir was victorious. There was no competition for smaller choirs, owing to the entries being insufficient. Mr. E. Minshall conducted four thousand adult singers, representatives of over a hundred metropolitan and provincial Nonconformist choirs, and in both the sacred and the secular pieces a high degree of efficiency was manifested. Against occasional hesitancy of attack may be fairly set creditable attention to light and shade and evenly-maintained volume of tone. Dr. J. Varley Roberts's Easter anthem "Christ is risen from the dead," Gounod's "By Babylon's Wave," H. Davan Wetton's festival anthem "Sing, O heavens," and Mendelssohn's "Hear my prayer" were rendered with a spirit that elicited hearty recognition. In the second part a good reception awaited Thomas Facer's four-part song "Rest thee, my little one," William Jackson's chorus, à la valse, "Oh, the flowery month of June," Henry Leslie's part-song "Homeward," and H. Hugh Pierson's stirring setting of Thomas Campbell's poem "Ye mariners of England." Arthur Berridge's part-song "O gentle wind," which (like Charles Darnton's anthem "I will sing of the mercies of the Lord for ever") won a prize offered by the Union, also obtained favour. The winning choir gave in excellent style Henry Leslie's "The lullaby of life." Miss Kate Cove sang some solos (including the lovely "O for the wings" in Mendelssohn's motet) with much charm, and the orchestra of the Union (efficiently conducted by Mr. T. R. Croger) joined that of the Palace in Macfarren's Overture to "St. John the Baptist."

MUSICAL ASSOCIATION.

THE RECORDER.

THE twenty-fourth session of the Musical Association was concluded at the Royal College of Organists on the 14th ult., when Mr. C. Welch read a paper on "Literature relating to the Recorder." The lecturer began by quoting various descriptions given of the Recorder in dictionaries and by various writers, quoting from Pepys's diary of the date April 8, 1668, in which he says he paid a visit to Drumbleby, "and did talk a great deal about pipes; and did buy Recorder, which I do intend to learn to play on, the sounds of it being, of all sounds in the world, most pleasing to me." In Bright's edition of Pepys, 1875, a Recorder is described as a "large flute blown through a mouth-piece like a clarionet in the present day"; but in the still more elaborate edition of the diary, which had lately been brought out by Mr. Wheatley, a Recorder was stated to be "a reed instrument, but in the side near the mouthpiece there was a hole covered with a piece of bladder, which modified the quality of the sound."

The lecturer then divided flutes into three classes, which he severally termed nostril, lip, and fipple (fipple being the technical name of the plug by which the tube was reduced in size). The first did not come within the scope of the present inquiry; it was in use chiefly, but not exclusively, in the South Sea Islands, and specimens were to be found in European museums. The varieties of the lip or German flute were the piccolo and the fife. To this class belonged Pan pipes, as well as the Egyptian Nàv. The fipple flute was now well nigh extinct, and only survived in the little six-holed pipe, so often heard in the streets of London.

It might reasonably be supposed that the word flute came over with William the Conqueror, but "Recorder" appeared to have been a word of English growth. The instrument was in the zenith of its popularity about 1512. Henry VIII., then at the age of twenty-one, was a flute player. In the inventory of his wardrobe there were mentioned six cases of flutes and thirteen cases of Recorders. In an engraving included in the "Thesaurus Musicus," published in 1693, and "being a collection of the newest songs performed at Their Majesties Theatres; and at the Consorts in Viller-Street, in York-Buildings, and in Charles-Street, Covent Garden," were represented four angels, three of whom were playing Recorders. One of the chief difficulties in tracing the development of the Recorder was its having been confused with other instruments.

Neither Hawkins nor Burney, the former born in 1719, the latter in 1726, seemed to have entertained the faintest suspicion that the flute with which they were so familiar had once been known as the Recorder. It was not only in England that the Recorder had changed its name; in France also a new appellation had been assigned to it. It is true that it was still termed la flûte douce; but la flûte d'Angleterre and la flûte à neuf trous had been abandoned to make way for la flûte à bec, or the beaked flute. By 1735 this expression had found its way into England or at least into Scotland. It did not, however, seem to have come into general use in this country in the eighteenth century, notwithstanding that Hawkins pronounced it to be "the most proper and discriminating appellation"; but in the present day it was often employed. Just as the harpsichord gave way to the pianoforte, so the Recorder yielded to the German flute, the greater command over sustained notes and the power of influencing intonation possessed by the lip flute proving too strong to be resisted, and an indication that the career of the Recorder was drawing to a close was to be found in its name undergoing another change. The German flute was called "the flute" and the Recorder was termed "the common flute." Its knell was now about to sound; with the harpsichord it scarcely survived the eighteenth century.

TRINITY COLLEGE—LECTURE.

THE PSYCHOLOGY OF MUSICAL APPRECIATION.

MR. EDGAR F. JACQUES, being the Queen Victoria lecturer at Trinity College this year, chose for his subject "The Psychology of Musical Appreciation," which he treated in a masterlike manner on May 24 and 31.

At the first lecture music was considered as a "Presentative Art," at the second as a "Representative Art." The lecturer said that early investigations into the essential nature of music and of its originating factors were unsatisfactory, for instead of recognising the complexity of the phenomena in question, they, for the most part, fastened upon one salient characteristic, and, ignoring all others, formulated it in a more or less laconic fashion as a definition of the essential nature of the art. One extreme was exemplified by Leibnitz, who defined musical audition as "an unconsciously-made arithmetical calculation"; the other was supplied by the view put forward by so many writers (of keen sensibility but small observing powers) that music was simply and solely an appeal to our feelings or emotions, originating in the inflections of speech or the inarticulate cries of animals and men. Between these two views we had the theory that the object of the art of sounds was to satisfy our sense of beauty. But the complex nature of artistic manifestations, and of their effect on those to whom they made appeal, had been brought most prominently to light by the investigation of psychologists. Our senses being the medium of communication between the outer world and our inner life, it was fitting first to consider musical appreciation in its sensuous aspect. The sensuous element of music was regarded with some suspicion, but without this primitive form of enjoyment we should be incapable of higher pleasures, should, indeed, be music haters, because haters of sound itself. Sound was simply the name by which we designated a mental effect of the kind called a sensation. The first step was to distinguish between noises and tones, the next step to discriminate between tones and timbres. The sensuous effects composers availed themselves of were very numerous—degrees of power and speed, by which they could excite or soothe the nerve centres, timbre, and tone colour in orchestral combinations. Sound was therefore the raw material which gave pleasure to the senses, and, when arranged in certain ways, it interested and delighted the intellectual faculties.

A succession of different kinds of sounds was shown to be necessary to secure continued satisfaction to the ear, and a comprehensive relation was given of the factors necessary to excite and give pleasure to the higher mental faculties. The association of certain sounds, figures, and phrases with the various experiences of life was very happily treated, and the connection shown to depend upon not only the music, but also on the susceptibility of each hearer. The suggestive power of music was divided into several categories. With regard to instrumental music, there was the composer's intention, the means at his disposal, and the capacity of his listeners. The various kinds of pieces were then described. The higher we ascended in the scale of merit among works written to give intellectual pleasure, the more did we find that striking and well designed effects of form tended to invest a piece with more or less distinctive character. Rhythm alone was capable of suggesting an enormous number of variations of character. These suggestions of varieties of character were shown to be the result of the similarity between the movements of animate nature and those of the musical rhythms adopted; but as every kind of movement was associated with many events, and as the movement alone could be imitated, music could only suggest the indefinite. The same held good with regard to the imitations of sounds and inflections of the human voice. Characteristic forms of such tones were easy to imitate on instruments. Berlioz had described the effects producible from instruments in terms of emotional feeling, and certain figures had been for centuries used, such as a suspension resolved downwards to express grief and desolation.

A large number of examples were played by the lecturer and were admirably chosen to illustrate the principal points of the discourses.

GREEK FOLK-SONGS.

M. ARAMIS gave another of his attractive recitals of old popular Greek folk-songs, on the 3rd ult., at the Steinway Hall. As on previous occasions, a considerable number of the songs were drawn from the fine collection made by M. Bourgault-Ducoudray; but several others had been collected by M. Aramis, and two of them were new to London. These were respectively entitled "My Helen" and "The Battle of Mega Spélion," and had been harmonised with artistic discretion by Mr. Edgar F. Jacques. Both proved excellent examples of the distinctive class to which they belong, and were interpreted by the concert-giver with the dramatic point and Southern intensity of expression which this music imperatively demands. Three other lyrics were accompanied by the expressive and poetic gesture dancing of Mdlle. Sandrini attired in statuesque draperies, and one of them proved so attractive that its repetition was insisted upon. An admirably lucid description was given by Mr. E. F. Jacques of the Ancient Greek scales and modes upon which the melodies of these folk-songs are based, and in the second part he read some interesting remarks, by M. Bourgault-Ducoudray, on the history and peculiarities of the European dances of the sixteenth, seventeenth, and eighteenth centuries, illustrations of the various steps being given by Mdlle. Sandrini.

A "TOURNAMENT OF SONG" IN THE YORKSHIRE DALES.

MUSIC competitions are doing an excellent work, not only in advancing the technical powers of competitors, but also in intensifying the appreciation of good music in provincial England. Conducted in accordance with the methods first adopted at Kendal, their results are thoroughly wholesome, and they have probably never yet found a more fitting field than in the purely agricultural district of Wensleydale, one of the most beautiful of the North Yorkshire Dales, where a "Tournament of Song," as it was officially styled, was inaugurated on May 28. Leyburn itself, where the tournament took place, is something between a small market town and a large village, and was probably the most populous of any of the centres contributing competitors. The area from which those who took part were drawn was very judiciously limited, thus making the event a purely local one and excluding that pest, the common "pot-hunter."

Considering that the competition was an entirely new venture among a people not prone to run after novelty, the entries were encouragingly numerous, while the quality of the performances was in many instances remarkably good. In the morning we had juvenile competitors, beginning with young violinists, whose general musicianship was tested by their being required to play any scale chosen by the judge. In the next class, the two-part songs, Mendelssohn's charming little piece "Evening Song" formed the test and provoked a curious controversy, one of the choirs singing it without the very essential accompaniment, and, having learnt it in this fashion, proved quite unable to sing it when an accompanist was provided. Under these circumstances they were very properly disqualified, but, being successful in other respects, and hailing from a remote little village where such efforts deserved every possible encouragement, a "consolation prize" was provided for them by a sympathiser. The most popular thing in the forenoon's proceedings was an action song, performed by children under seven. There was only one entry in this class, but the high state of training shown by the diminutive performers from Askrigg sufficiently accounted for the absence of competition. Mr. Gaul's "Union Jack" lends occasion for much marching and counter-marching, as well as for the donning of picturesque costumes, and in both these respects the Lilliputian army of Askrigg were so delightful that their evolutions had to be repeated at the close of the day's doings.

In the afternoon came the turn of the seniors. A well-known Thuringian Volkslied was sung by four male-voice quartet parties, who attained a very even level of excellence, while Mendelssohn's well-worn "Departure" formed an excellent test piece for the mixed-voice quartets. Perhaps the best results were attained in the important madrigal and anthem competitions. Edwards's "In going to my lonely bed" was sung with exceptional steadiness in the former class, and in the latter Farrant's dignified piece of devotional music, "Lord, for Thy tender mercies' sake," provided a very interesting exhibition. The winners, who came from a little lonely village named Grinton, sang the music by heart and without any conductor, but with an accuracy and an appreciation of the character of the composition that were quite delightful. Though there was only one entry for the string quartet, Leyburn deserves credit for introducing such a competition at its very first meeting, an enterprise which we believe to be without precedent. Haydn's variations on "The Emperor's Hymn" were, considering the difficulties that lie under their seeming simplicity, very creditably performed, and Mr. H. M. Bower, who judged the instrumental competitions, had no hesitation in allowing the quartet party the fruits of their walk over. There were also sight singing classes for soloists, both senior and junior, which may, it is to be hoped, be extended to choirs when the time is ripe. Miss Wakefield was the judge of the singing, and her co-operation was thoroughly appreciated by all, from whom not even the unsuccessful competitors need be excluded, for she made her criticisms as palatable as they were judicious by the geniality that characterised her remarks.

On no account should we neglect to acknowledge the very important share in promoting this tournament, whose permanency seems assured, of the Hon. Lucien Orde-Powlett, who has done so much to popularise good music in the North of Yorkshire. To the assiduity of the hon. secretary, Mrs. H. Walker, the fact that the arrangements were carried out with a smoothness remarkable in a new organisation may be largely attributed.

THE LOWER RHINE MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

THE three days' musical festival of the Lower Rhine took place, as usual, during Whitsuntide, on May 29, 30, and 31, at Cologne. The programme may be said, broadly speaking, to have presented a review of the three great epochs of musical development; the classical being represented by Bach, Handel, and Beethoven; the romantic by Mendelssohn, Schumann, and Berlioz; and the modern by Brahms, Wagner, and Richard Strauss. The choral works included Bach's magnificent double chorus "Nun ist das Heil," Handel's oratorio "Deborah," Mendelssohn's setting of the Ninety-eighth Psalm for double chorus, orchestra, and organ, and Berlioz's "Faust"; the last Finale from Beethoven's "Fidelio," with its admirably interpreted choral portions, having likewise to be classed in this category. The performance of "Deborah," though an excellent one on the part of the choir, numbering some 600 vocalists, was considered less satisfactory as regards the interpreters of the important solo parts—Mesdames Wittisch, of Dresden, and Geller-Wolter, of Berlin; Herren Ernst Kraus, of Berlin, and Bertram, of Munich; these otherwise excellent artists being, with the exception, perhaps, of Frau Geller-Wolter, scarcely sufficiently initiated into the spirit of Handelian oratorio. The adoption of the original orchestration met with very general appreciation, while the organ (ably played by the Cologne organist, Herr W. Franke) and a pianoforte, supported by two violoncellos, contributed not a little to the general effect. The purely orchestral portions of the programme, admirably rendered throughout by an orchestra of 160 executants, included the Symphonies in A major by Beethoven and in C major by Schumann, the "Eulenspiegel" tone-picture by Richard Strauss, the Overture to "Oberon," and the "Meistersinger" Vorspiel. Amongst the individual artists' performances to which the final day of the festival was, as usual, chiefly devoted, may be specially instanced those contributed by Madame Bloomfield-Zeisler, who played, amongst other numbers, the C minor Concerto of M. Saint-Saëns, and by Herr Willy Hess, the Cologne violinist, whose interpretation of Spohr's "Gesangscene" created an indescribable enthusiasm. Professor Wüllner, the inspiriting and indefatigable conductor throughout the entire festival, also received, at its conclusion, a well deserved ovation from an audience which crowded every part of the large hall of the Gürzenich.

THE annual meeting of the Allgemeine Deutsche Musik Verein was announced to take place at Mayence during the five days from the 25th to the 29th ult., one of the most important subjects on the agenda being the discussion of the statutes of the newly-formed Society for the Protection of the Rights of German Authors and Composers. Among the principal works in the musical programme were Berlioz's "Faust," a new pianoforte trio by Philipp Scharwenka, and several new chamber works by other composers; Tschaïkowsky's Concert Fantasia for pianoforte and orchestra (pianist, Mr. F. Lamond) and the final scene from "Die Meistersinger." Herren Steinbach and Vollbach were the conductors.

A COMMITTEE of musicians in Berlin have recently passed a favourable judgment upon the Virgil Technic Clavier and Virgil Technic Clavier Method. The signatories to the report are Dr. Otto Lessmann, Felix Dreyschock, Dr. Ernest Jedliczka, Professor C. Lutschg, Dr. C. Krebs, Phillip Scharwenka, and Dr. Oscar Bie.

A SECOND edition of Miss Freda Winworth's excellent little book, "The Epic of Sounds: an elementary interpretation of Wagner's Nibelungen Ring," has recently been issued.

REVIEWS.

Original Compositions for the Organ. Nos. 262—269. [Novello and Company, Limited.]

THIS useful series of organ pieces continues to grow rapidly. There is ample variety in the eight numbers now before us. Nos. 262 and 263 consist of "Six Short Pieces," by Josef Rheinberger, whose name alone is sufficient guarantee for their sterling excellence. The "Six Pieces" are a Prelude in C, a characteristic Intermezzo in E minor, an Epilogue in E flat, a Canzonetta in E, a Consolation in B flat, and a Trio in D minor. All of them are not only attractive, but they present no difficulties, and therefore they should be welcomed by many church organists. An "Allegretto pastorale," by Mr. Clowes Bayley (No. 264), fully justifies its title, as the low D in the pedal is sustained throughout the whole length of the composition—seventy-nine bars. It is therefore needless to say that the pedal part of this "pastorale" presents no serious difficulty to the performer. Although Mr. Hamilton Clarke is a prolific composer he generally has something interesting to say. His "Serenade" (No. 265) is a pleasing melody in B flat for a solo stop with a light chordal accompaniment, and is quite easy of execution. The Allegretto in A flat (No. 266), by Mr. W. Wolstenholme, will serve as a useful outgoing voluntary. A more solid number is an "Introduction and Toccata in G minor," by Dr. Walter H. Sangster (No. 267), which will be found useful as a postlude. Last, but by no means least, are Schumann's "Four Sketches, originally composed for the pedal pianoforte" (Nos. 268 and 269). These well-known pieces by Schumann, like good wine, need no bush. But their practical utility as organ pieces has been greatly enhanced in the present publication by the admirable manner in which they have been laid out for the king of instruments by so experienced a performer as Mr. John E. West.

Richard Wagner's Prose Works. Translated by William Ashton Ellis. Vol. VI., "Religion and Art." [Kegan Paul, Trench, Trübner and Co., Ltd.]

THE appearance of the sixth volume of Wagner's literary works in an English dress helps one to realise the stupendous task Mr. Ashton Ellis set himself when he undertook the arduous duty of translation—a task, moreover, attended with formidable difficulties. Mr. Ashton Ellis is not only a devoted disciple of the Bayreuth master, but he gives abundant proof of thoroughness in his work that merits the highest commendation. It is impossible, within the limits of our space, to do little more than indicate the contents of this volume of nearly four hundred pages. Its generic title, like the previous instalments, is a convenient one: moreover, with the solitary exception of "Religion and Art" (including its first supplement, "What boots this knowledge?") its contents appear for the first time in an English version. Beginning with "Spohr's 'Jessonda' at Leipzig"—contributed to the Musikalisches Wochenblatt, January, 1875—the reader is presented with eight minor Bayreuth papers of special interest in regard to the plans connected with Wagner's settlement in the now celebrated Bavarian town. In a short paper entitled "A retrospect of the stage-festivals of 1876," Wagner pays a high tribute to Hans Richter, as the conductor of the orchestra, in the following appreciative terms: "My proved effector of impossibilities and pledge of responsibilities." In the essay "Modern," Wagner's rooted dislike to the Jews finds vigorous expression. "What is the 'modern world'?" he asks. "The same old world, plus the Jews; their ruin of the German language and usurpation of our Press," &c.

The most important section of the volume is that which furnishes its title—the essay "Religion and Art," and its supplements. The opening sentence may serve as a specimen of the master's views on the relationship of those subjects: "One might say that where Religion becomes artificial, it is reserved for Art to save the spirit of Religion by recognising the figurative value of the mythic symbols which the former would have us believe in their literal sense, and revealing their deep and hidden truth through an ideal presentation." The volume contains interesting papers on "Parsifal at Bayreuth, 1882," and on "A youthful symphony." The latter, a boyish production at the age of nineteen, was submitted, in 1832, to Rochlitz, then the factotum of the Gewandhaus concerts at Leipzig. "What's this?" enquired the worthy old gentleman with astonishment at the youthful appearance of the composer. However, the symphony was duly performed on January 10, 1833. Mr. Ellis, in one of his interesting foot-notes (p. 316), says that Clara Wieck, afterwards Madame Schumann, was a débutante at the same concert. But, as a matter of fact, she first appeared in the famous concert hall on October 20, 1828, and at one of the regular concerts, September 30, 1832. Wagner's fondness for animals is shown in the essay "against Vivisection." "Many a lesson could we gain from beasts," he says in effect, "courage and fidelity, their loving reverence of man as God." For those readers who may not feel disposed to read the whole of the book, or who wish to sample the contents of each essay before mastering it in detail, Mr. Ashton Ellis, as heretofore, considerately provides a very useful and lucid summary. In the matter of editing, the comprehensive index, and its general get-up, the volume is quite equal to its predecessors.

The Glory of the God of Israel. Full Anthem for Whitsuntide and general use. Composed by Thomas Adams. No. 593, Novello's Octavo Anthems.

[Novello and Company, Limited.]

THE text of this anthem is taken from Ezekiel xliii. 2, and Isaiah lxvi. 13, 14, and it has received a setting admirably in sympathy with its subject and one which will interest a well trained choir. It opens with a bold theme in four-part harmony, relieved by some effective points of imitation. This is succeeded by a section in slow tempo of expressive character, after which a return is made to the opening portion. With this the anthem is intended to finish when sung on general occasions, but for the Whitsuntide season there is added an impressive setting of "Come, Thou Holy Paraclete," which is directed to be sung kneeling, and which is closed in an effective manner by an ancient ending to the Whitsuntide Sequence.

Princess Snowflake. The Court of Queen Summergold. Fairy operettas for children. Words by Isa J. Postgate. Music by Herbert W. Wareing.

THERE are no greater or more necessary friends to children than fairies. Every child testifies to this as a fact, and every youthful man and woman who recognises the responsibilities of this important period of life will profit by being made acquainted with the good offices of Princess Snowflake and Queen Summergold. In the first-named operetta is revealed the little-known power which the Frost Fairies have of changing into a fairy any fir-tree which may be threatened by mortals with being converted into a Christmas tree. A fairy named Nicoletta has thus been saved from destruction, but craves to be re-transformed into her original state, and, far from dreading the fate from which she has been rescued, desires it, that she may confer happiness. Princess Snowflake yields after some remonstrance to the request, and in the second act we find Nicoletta in the ball-room of Thrushcross Grange, duly decked as a Christmas tree, where she forms the central object of a gay party, and is visited by her former companions and praised for her unselfishness and self-sacrifice. Besides Princess Snowflake and Nicoletta, there are three other characters—Frostfinger, a fairy; Maurice Tressillian, and Funny Robin, all of whom have songs to sing with the exception of Maurice, who has a speaking part only. The songs are set to melodious measures, and the choruses for fairies and children are written in unison, all difficulties being studiously avoided. The incidental music comprises a gavotte, minuet, and march, and the scene of the Christmas party might easily be made entertaining alike to the participants and the audience.

"The Court of Queen Summergold" is opened by the announcement that her Majesty awaits the arrival of her four emissaries, Snowflake, Raindrop, Sunbeam, and Zephyr, who were sent out a year before to confer happiness on the world of mortals. The envoys respectively arrive and relate what they have done in several songs. Snowflake has "made the old earth look like a bride"; Raindrop has saved the life of a lark, and again set it soaring and singing heavenward; Sunbeam has broken the Frost King's spear; and Zephyr has wafted the scent of a violet to a sick girl and "made her dream of Springtime blooms." Queen Summergold is so pleased with these results that she makes the emissaries Princesses of Fairyland, and with much mutual congratulations the pretty little opera closes. In addition to the five characters above-mentioned, there is a speaking part provided in Heatherwing, who may be described as the Queen's chief maid of honour. The music is bright and vivacious and includes a rhythmical gavotte, and the choruses are written in unison.

Third Scherzo. Sixth Tarantella. For the Pianoforte. By Walter Macfarren. [Edwin Ashdown, Limited.]

THESE pieces by Mr. Macfarren are melodious and exhilarating contributions to the lighter side of pianoforte music. It is hardly necessary to say that they are written with a full knowledge of the capabilities of the instrument, and that they will assuredly prove acceptable.

Mass of the Holy Name. For Chorus, with Organ accompaniment. By Frederick Westlake.

[Novello and Company, Limited.]

THE late Mr. Frederick Westlake was so well known as a distinguished teacher of the pianoforte that his compositions—few, though excellent—have not received that attention they undoubtedly deserve. The Mass before us is not only eminently practical in regard to its length and facility of execution, but it unmistakably bears the mark of the true musician on every page. A foot-note records the fact that "The organ part is arranged from the orchestral score, which consists of wind instruments and double-basses." But whether in its effective original form, or with its well-arranged organ accompaniment, this artistic contribution to the service music of the Church, of which Frederick Westlake was a devoted member, distinctly merits full recognition.

MUSIC IN BIRMINGHAM.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

AN impressive scene was witnessed in our Town Hall on the day of Mr. Gladstone's funeral, when Mr. C. W. Perkins, the city organist, had arranged a musical service in memory of the departed statesman. Long before the commencement of the function the building was thronged with a hushed and expectant audience, while outside some hundreds stayed for some time awaiting the opening of the doors, not knowing that the hall had been filled and closed long before their arrival. Chopin's Prelude in C minor formed the opening piece, played by Mr. Perkins on the organ. Then came the fine old tune "St. Ann's," Isaac Watts's hymn "O God, our help in ages past," the people rising en masse and joining fervently and reverently in singing the impressive strains. Mr. Perkins followed with Chopin's Funeral March, and then again the audience rose and joined in Mr. Gladstone's favourite hymn, "Rock of Ages," sung to Redhead's familiar tune. Miss Aimée Wathen, a local soprano, sang with much feeling "I know that my Redeemer," and Miss Minnie Hackett, our local contralto, followed with "O rest in the Lord." The musical service also included the quartet from the "Elijah," "Cast thy burden upon the Lord," given by Mr. S. Evans, Mr. William Evans, and the two ladies named; the concluding piece being the Dead March in "Saul."

A music demonstration in connection with the Birmingham School Board Choirs took place in the Town Hall, on the 10th ult. Seven choirs competed, each choir singing two pieces of its own selection in three-part harmony, and finally the combined choirs sang, in addition to several part-songs, a two-part sight test, written specially for the occasion by Mr. George Oakey. Mr. W. Dobson conducted, and Mr. Perkins supplied the accompaniments on the organ. The whole demonstration was of a most pleasing nature and strongly testified to the admirable work done by our Board Schools to foster taste for music and to impart a certain standard of musical knowledge to the young ones that will ever remain a source of pleasure and delight to them in their various paths of life. The sight test was almost note-perfect in its rendering and the pitch was well maintained.

The musical season in connection with the Edgbaston Botanical Gardens opened on the 8th ult., and on Saturday, the 11th ult., an admirable vocal and instrumental concert was organised by Mr. Oscar Pollack, under whose direction eight other similar concerts will be given during the season.

The customary terminal concerts of the present session in connection with the Midland Institute School of Music opened, on the 9th ult., with an admirable concert given by Mr. Max Mossel's classes. His most promising violin pupils took part in it, assisted in the concerted pieces by several accomplished amateurs. The last concert, given on the 17th ult., was provided by the Students' Orchestral Class, under Mr. Ward's conductorship. The programme included Saint-Saëns's Suite, Haydn's Seventh Symphony, Cherubini's Overture "Der Wasserträger," and a clarinet solo with orchestral accompaniment, the Andante cantabile from Mr. Fred. Ward's Second Concerto, beautifully played by Mr. Arthur Ward.

Mr. Monteith Randell's choir gave an excellent selection of part-songs, trios, quartets, and choruses at the Edgbaston Botanical Gardens, on the 15th ult. The singing was distinguished by fine tone-quality and light and shade.

MUSIC IN BRISTOL.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

No concerts of considerable importance have taken place in Bristol and the neighbourhood during the past month, but there has been activity in other directions, showing that musical life is by no means dormant. The visit of the Bristol Choral Society to the Alexandra Palace, on the 11th ult., to assist in what proved to be an excellent performance of Mendelssohn's "Elijah," under the direction of Mr. Riseley, noticed elsewhere, may be briefly referred to.

As already stated in THE MUSICAL TIMES, it has been decided to hold a festival next year, provided that a sufficient sum to cover possible emergencies is guaranteed by the early autumn. No preparations have yet been made to form a choir and to study works for performance; and the result must necessarily be that, if the guarantee is forthcoming, an immense amount of labour must be compressed into a comparatively short space of time.

The annual meeting of the Bristol Choral Society took place on the 16th ult., when a very encouraging report was presented, and it was stated that the season just concluded had been the most successful, musically and financially, in the annals of the Society. Sullivan's "Golden Legend," "The Messiah," Beethoven's Mass in D, Rossini's Stabat Mater, and Brahms's "Song of Destiny" are among the works to be performed at the four concerts to be given during next season.

Thirty choirs took part in the festival of the Bath and Wells Diocesan Choral Association, on the 9th ult., at Wells Cathedral. The Magnificat and Nunc dimittis were T. A. Walmisley's setting in D minor, and the anthem was Goss's "Praise the Lord, O my soul." The singing was the best we have ever heard by the church choirs of the Diocese when joined together, and indicates considerable activity and energy on the part of the various choirmasters and the conductor, Mr. A. P. Stanley. The choirs constituting the Dunster Deanery branch of the Association had a festival celebration, at Dunster, on the 16th ult.

MUSIC AT CAMBRIDGE.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE University Musical Society's chamber concert, on May 11, attracted a large audience. The Wietrowetz Quartet and Miss Gwendolyn Toms were the instrumentalists. The principal piece was Schumann's Pianoforte Quartet in E flat, and Miss Wietrowetz and Miss Toms contributed solos. Mr. Plunket Greene was the vocalist, his selection of songs being, as usual, unhackneyed and interesting. He was eminently successful in a group of Irish songs arranged by Dr. Wood—his rendering of "Over here" being quite startling in its intensity.

The performance of Dr. Stanford's "Requiem," and the appearance of the University Professor in King's Chapel to conduct his work, drew a large audience to the "Festival Service" held in the magnificent building. With Miss Ethel Wood, Miss Brema, Mr. Thomas Thomas, and Mr. Plunket Greene as principals, and Dr. Mann's fine chorus and a professional orchestra, the noble work received probably the most impressive rendering it has yet obtained. The peculiar acoustical conditions of the building were, however, once more evident, and some effects were extraordinarily enhanced, others were lost. The slow movements were ethereally beautiful, but the rapid choruses were less satisfactory, and much of the delicate orchestration was inaudible.

The Cambridge University Musical Society provided an excellent programme on the 13th ult., consisting of "The Walpurgis Night," Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony, and a new work by Dr. Charles Wood. The latter is a setting of Milton's Ode "On Time," and is for chorus only. It is a noble and dignified presentation of the fine words. The impassioned middle section, "Joy shall overtake us as a flood," is singularly beautiful, and a short but finely worked and very effective fugue forms a triumphant conclusion. The rendering was excellent. The solos in "The Walpurgis Night" were undertaken by Mrs. Burrell, Mr. William Green, and Mr. William Higley, a young baritone with a magnificent voice of whom more will be heard. They were all excellent, and Mr. Green in particular deserves special credit, as he was far from well.

The numerous College concerts require but little mention. Brahms's "Zigeuner Lieder" at King's, Stanford's "Phaudrig Crohoore" at St. John's, and Dr. Wood's "Ballad of Agincourt" at Caius are the most noteworthy pieces in a very miscellaneous set of programmes. The University Musical Club this year relied on resident members for its open concert. They were justified, however, in the result, and that four amateurs should give such an excellent performance of Brahms's A minor Quartet is a notable fact.

MUSIC IN EAST ANGLIA.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE Ladies' Orchestral Society made its tenth public appearance in the Noverre Rooms, Norwich, on May 26. The Society has hitherto imported a few wood-wind performers from the metropolis. On this occasion, however, the services of these ladies were dispensed with, and the Society was represented by a quintet of strings and a pianoforte. In such fully scored works as Mozart's "Parisian" Symphony and Mendelssohn's "Meerestille" Overture the wind parts were much missed. Unstinted praise is due to the fair violinists for their good tone and unanimity of phrasing, points upon which their conductor (Mr. F. W. B. Noverre) must have spent much time. Several minor compositions for the band, together with pianoforte solos by Miss Josephine Woodrow, and Svendsen's Romance for the violin, played with the greatest taste and judgment by Miss Mary Noverre, made up an interesting programme, which was further varied with songs by Miss Maggie Purvis and Miss Agatha Batty.

The Bungay Choral Society completed its season on May 24 with a successful performance of "The Messiah," conducted by Mr. W. Harvey. The principal parts were filled by Miss Sylvia Bennett, Miss Maude Elliott, Mr. Sadleur Brown, and Mr. MacInnes, while Mr. F. W. B. Noverre led the small band.

At the fifth concert in connection with the Yoxford Choral Society, conducted by Captain Wilmer, the principal number was Van Bree's cantata "St. Cecilia's Day," the solo part being sung with happy effect by Mrs. William Wilmer. The singing of the chorus showed signs of careful training, precision in attack and general steadiness being worthy of commendation. Mr. C. A. Wright was the leader of the band.

The Old Hunstanton Choral Society gave an excellent entertainment on the 4th ult. Under Mr. Leslie's training the Society sang several part-songs in capital style. Mr. and Mrs. A. Scott Gatty and Mr. Walter Burrell contributed songs in a most artistic manner, while local vocalists and instrumentalists added much to the pleasure of the audience.

MUSIC IN OXFORD.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

EXCEPT for a Public Classical Concert of the usual type early in May, a creditable rendering of Haydn's "Seasons" by the Cowley St. John Musical Society, and a performance of Mr. John Farmer's "Christ and His Soldiers," on May 5, which drew to the Town Hall the largest audience that has hitherto assembled there, the main interest of the term's music has been found in the College concerts, which seem every year to increase in number and importance. Indeed, the "Eights week" concerts really amount to a miniature musical festival. Even a casual glance over the programmes suffices to show the meritorious character of the aims of the various committees of management. The following list only gives the principal pieces at the different concerts: "Feramors" ballet music, Rubinstein (Hertford College, May 19); Symphony, No. 2, Beethoven, and D minor Symphony, Haydn (Balliol College, May 22); "Faust" ballet music, Gounod (Brasenose College, May 23); "Coriolan" Overture, Beethoven, two movements of the Violin Concerto, and the "Italian" Symphony, Mendelssohn (Exeter College, May 24); Serenata in G major, Mozart, and "Hebrides" Overture, Mendelssohn (Worcester College, May 25); Symphony in A major, Mozart, and "King Arthur," Purcell (Merton College, May 26); "Unfinished" Symphony, Schubert; "To the Sons of Art," Mendelssohn, and "Burial of Dundee," E. T. Sweeting (Queen's College, May 27). It is, of course, quite impossible to enter into any details of such a number of concerts, but it should certainly be recorded that the standard of performance reached was distinctly high. Exeter have again managed to work their concert up to the scale on which it was given some ten years ago, which is a ground for congratulation, and Worcester have once more, after too long an interval, taken their old position.

As a sort of postscript, "Hero and Leander," C. H. Lloyd, "The Revenge," C. V. Stanford, and a choral ballad by A. W. Wilson were performed at Keble College, on the 16th ult. There have also been concerts of the miscellaneous type at Lincoln, Jesus, and Pembroke Colleges. Space will only permit of attention being directed to the fact that three new works made their appearance—Dr. A. W. Wilson's choral ballad "Before the beginning," which was well received at Keble; Mr. A. H. D. Prendergast's part-song "Echo," which the audience at Queen's insisted on having twice over; and, above all, to our thinking, Dr. E. T. Sweeting's ballad "The Burial of Dundee." More picturesque and striking music than this work contains it is hardly possible to imagine.

Sir John Stainer dealt with the subject of "Cathedral Music" in his terminal lecture, which was given in the Sheldonian Theatre, on the 8th ult.

MUSIC IN AMERICA.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE sixth public service of the American Guild of Organists took place on the evening of the 9th ult., at the historic old Plymouth Church, Brooklyn, made famous by Henry Ward Beecher. The programme was as follows: Magnificat in D, Marks; "List the Cherubic Host" ("Holy City"), Gaul; "Out of darkness," Gounod; tenor solo, "I was in the spirit"; and chorus, "I am Alpha," Ames. The choir consists of a large body of men and women, under the direction of Professor C. H. Morse. The Guild's special order of service was, as usual, followed. This service practically brings the Church musical season to a close.

A new dramatic cantata, "Hiawatha," from Longfellow's poem, by F. R. Burton, was performed at Chickering Hall, on May 16, by a chorus, gathered together for the purpose by the composer, and the Seidl orchestra. The festival of song given by the People's Choral Society and Singing Classes, on May 23, 24, and 25, proved to be a very interesting occasion. The elementary division, consisting of 800 voices, gave the programme on the first day, on which the most interesting numbers were: "See the conquering hero comes" and "Ein' feste Burg," sung with admirable spirit and good tone. The chorus was assisted by Madame Juch and Mr. Ericsson Bushnell. The second programme, on May 24, was given by the advanced classes, 450 voices, under the direction of Mr. Damrosch, Mr. Hallam, and Mr. Marquard. The programme consisted of Mendelssohn's 95th Psalm, Gounod's "Gallia," Schumann's "Gipsy Life," and Bruch's "Jubilate" Amen. The festival concluded with a programme by the Choral Union, 700 voices (director, Mr. Damrosch), when Bruch's "Lay of the Bell" was given with orchestra. The singing was particularly good, and the chorus was fully under the control of its conductor. Great improvement was shown on the work done last year, when "The Messiah" was performed. Mr. Damrosch is to be congratulated on the success attending his efforts to provide music for the masses. We trust that the good work he is doing will go on, and that the example of New York in this respect will, in time, be followed by other cities.

The third concert of the Troy Musical Society (Mr. Clement R. Gale, conductor) took place on the 1st ult., when the Society was assisted by the Albania Orchestra. Various part-songs were given and six orchestral numbers, the most successful of which was the performance of the Three Dances from "Henry VIII.," by German. The usual good work was done by the chorus.

Notices have been issued by the American Guild of Organists of the second competition for the Clemson gold medal. The manuscripts must be in the hands of the Secretary of the Guild not later than September 30. The words, which are fixed by the Committee of the Guild, are taken from Isaiah li., verses 3, 6, 8, 9, and 11. Last year's prize was awarded to Mr. William C. Macfarlane and the anthem was published by Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co. The words fixed for the present competition are certainly far more inspiring than those selected last year.

The Musical Art Society of New York offers a prize, given by Mr. and Mrs. Louis Butler McCagg, of 250 dollars for the best composition for mixed voices unaccompanied. The competition, which it is hoped will be an annual one, is open only to persons who have resided in the United States or Canada for the past five years or longer. Manuscripts are to be sent to the President of the Society, Dr. F. E. Hyde, 20, West 53rd Street, New York.

Mr. Emil Pauer has been elected conductor of the Philharmonic Society in succession to the late Anton Seidl. The first concert will be given in October next, when great things are expected from this change of conductorship.

Mr. Wm. L. Tomlins has, after twenty-three years of hard work, resigned the conductorship of the Apollo Musical Club of Chicago. In tendering his resignation, Mr. Tomlin states that his work with the Children's Chorus, now famous throughout the States, has grown so large, that he feels compelled to forego all other work and devote himself entirely to the children. In his letters he states that "gradually, yet surely it has been gaining recognition as an art force, destined perhaps to become a great factor in general education, until to-day, though scarce twenty years old, it is attracting the attention of thoughtful men and women all over the country. In the last year or two I have been called upon to address over a hundred large audiences in scores of places, among which might be named many of the chief cities from New York to San Francisco." We feel sure that Mr. Tomlins' absence will be deeply felt; but everyone interested in music will wish him God-speed in the work he is undertaking.

By the time this issue is published the 1898 meeting of the Music Teachers' National Association will be over. A full account will appear in our August number.

A HIGHLY interesting and most successful concert was given by the Cheltenham New Philharmonic Society, on May 24, when Liszt's rarely-heard and intensely devotional work, the 13th Psalm, was presented to a keenly enthusiastic audience. The difficult and exacting tenor solo was interpreted by Mr. William Green with much artistic feeling, and the chorus portion was highly effective, the balance of tone and precision of attack being excellent.

The pièce de resistance, however, was Beethoven's Eighth Symphony. The Society put forward this work as an experiment to test the public opinion in regard to their acceptance of classical orchestral works, and the result proved highly satisfactory. Every movement was vigorously and deservedly applauded, the whole work being most intelligently rendered. Other features of the programme included the "Der Freischütz" Overture and Ponchielli's charming ballet music from "La Giaconda." The chorus gave with fine nuance Sullivan's "Wreaths for our graves," Faning's popular part-song "The Miller's Wooing," and Glinka's Polonaise from the "Life for the Czar" as a finale. Mr. Lewis Hann, besides leading the orchestra, played in a masterly style the Rondo Capriccioso of Saint-Saëns, and Mr. William Green sang with fine declamatory power Gounod's "Lend me your aid." The concert was conducted, as usual, by Mr. C. J. Phillips, to whose enthusiasm and ability Cheltenham is much indebted for these excellent and instructive concerts. Elgar's "King Olaf" is to open the next season's campaign.

AMONGST the large number of concerts which have taken place during the past month should be recorded the following:—

ST. JAMES'S HALL.—M. Desider Nemes' violin recital, the 7th ult.; Miss Doris Dalton's concert, the 8th ult.; Miss Margaret Wild's pianoforte recital, the 14th ult.

QUEEN'S (SMALL) HALL.—Miss Adelaide Lambe's vocal and pianoforte recital, the 16th ult.; Mr. Arthur R. Little's pianoforte recital, the 15th ult.; Miss Elizabeth Patterson and Miss Maude Ribll's concert, the 20th ult.; Miss Gwendolyn Toms, Mr. Jasper Sutcliffe, and Mr. Arthur Williams's chamber concert, the 7th ult.; Miss Jessie Berg and Miss Clara Blumenthal's violin and pianoforte recital, the 21st ult.; Miss Eleanor Ring and Miss Eugenie Fox's pianoforte and dramatic recital, the 7th ult.

STEINWAY HALL.—Miss Stanley Lucas and Miss Lucie Johnstone's concert, the 2nd ult.; Mr. Jeffrey Craven's concert, the 9th ult.; Miss Florence Shee's concert, the 14th ult.; Miss E. Brook's recital, the 21st. ult.

SALLE-ERARD.—Miss Florence Daly's concert, the 8th ult.; the Misses Marianne and Clara Eissler's violin and harp recital, the 7th ult.

PORTMAN ROOMS.—Miss Clinton Fyne's pianoforte recital, the 6th ult.

AT the eighty-fifth concert of the Musical Artists' Society, held at St. Martin's Hall, on the 6th ult., no novelties were produced. Neither Mr. Walter Macfarren's tuneful, Mendelssohnian Sonata in D for violin and pianoforte nor Mr. Algernon Ashton's elaborate and masterly Pianoforte Quintet in E minor (Op. 100), which were the concerted pieces, is new, the former having been before the public for many years, while Mr. Ashton's Quintet has now been heard five times in London since 1892. On the present occasion excellent performances were secured by M. Emile Sauret and Miss Maude Wilson in the case of the sonata, and Messrs. Roth-Ronay, A. Maas, A. E. Ferir, Gallrein, and the composer in that of the quintet. M. Sauret also played Spohr's Concerto in A minor ("Scena Dramatica") splendidly. The Countess Valda Gleichen sang a number of songs, and the Misses Florence and Bertha Salter scored a sequence of successes with a number of vocal duets, including Mr. Alfred Gilbert's pretty "Bird of the Wilderness" and Mr. Louis Hillier's melodious "The Gondola." We are glad to observe that more attention is now paid to the adequate performance of chamber music at these concerts, but the programmes are still much too long.

THE students and choir of Trinity College (London) showed marked ability as well as promise of yet higher attainment at their concert in St. Martin's Town Hall, on the 7th ult. Their programme covered a good deal of ground, inasmuch as it comprised Dr. E. H. Turpin's cantata "Jerusalem," part-songs, sacred and secular vocal solos, Beethoven's Trio in D major (No. 5) for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, and Chopin's Fantasia in F minor for pianoforte. The choral singing spoke volumes for the pains taken by Dr. Pringuer, under whose conductorship this branch of operations at the Mandeville Place Institution is making such progress. The funeral anthem, "Brother, thou art gone before us," from Sullivan's "The Martyr of Antioch," was sympathetically given in memoriam of the late Professor Bradbury Turner. The choral portions of "Jerusalem" were sung with combined energy and judgment. Among the vocalists distinguishing themselves were the Misses P. Bushnell, Florence Hughes, Beatrice Oldfield, and Amy Biffen.

MISS ISABELLA DONKERSLEY and Mr. John Morley gave a concert at Camden House, Chislehurst, on May 26. The programme included two movements from Grieg's Violin and Pianoforte Sonata in F, effectively and impressively played by Miss Donkersley and Mrs. A. Robertson Steele, as were also a number of pieces by Fauré, Brahms, Corelli, and Handel. Pianoforte solos by Durand and Heller were performed by Mrs Steele, who proved herself a pianist gifted with an excellent technique and considerable individuality, while three movements for the flute, by Handel, were played with a good tone and much fluency by Mr. Charles Balme. Mr. John Morley, a young bass possessing a resonant voice of good compass, sang songs by Hatton, Bizet, Davies, and Audran, and the sympathetic quality of his voice, and his unaffected yet artistic style, pleased the audience much. Mrs. Balme, who produces a light high soprano voice with delightful ease and perfect intonation, sang the "Ave Maria" by Bach-Gounod and Fauré's "Sérénade Toscane."

AT the London Organ School and International College of Music, on May 27, the performance of compositions written for the prize given by Mr. Lesley Alexander took place. The successful work, which headed the programme, was a clever and effective Quintet in F for pianoforte, flute, clarinet, horn, and bassoon, by Edmondstoune Duncan, which obtained justice from Miss Gwendolyn Toms, Messrs. Wood, Draper, Borsdorf, and James. A "highly commended" production was Percy Hilder Miles's Septet in E flat for violin, viola, violoncello, double bass, clarinet, horn, and bassoon, entrusted to the safe hands of Messrs. Arthur Payne, Channell, Hambleton, Winterbottom, Draper, Borsdorf, and James. The third (slow) movement made a very favourable impression. These compositions were separated by some tasteful songs by Mr. Garnet Wolseley Cox, carefully given by Miss Amélie Molitor. The result of the competition was considered so satisfactory that Mr. Alexander intends to offer another prize next year.

AT the Alexandra Palace, on the 11th ult., a good performance of "Elijah" was given on festival scale. The Palace choir was increased by the Bristol Choral Society, with whom, as conductor of the oratorio, came the able Mr. George Riseley. The result of the combination was exceedingly satisfactory, the choruses being sung with a well-controlled vigour and impulse not always obtainable. Under such circumstances the Baal scene and other massive numbers could not but tell with splendid effect. The principal soloists were Miss Esther Palliser, Miss Giulia Ravogli, Messrs. Herbert Grover and Andrew Black. Master Frederic Pedgrift sang the passages for the Youth, and solo assistance was also rendered by Misses F. Cromey, Marion Harris, and C. Aldersley, Messrs. Fancourt and William Thomas. With such a competent choral force as the Alexandra Palace can command, oratorio here is a step in the right direction.

MISS JANOTHA presented a very attractive programme at St. James's Hall, on the 17th ult., in aid of a charity. A specially interesting feature was the performance by this artist, with Lady Randolph Churchill and Mrs. Craigie ("John Oliver Hobbes"), of Bach's Concerto in D minor for three pianofortes, the accompaniments being played by pupils of the Royal College of Music under the conductorship of Sir Hubert Parry. The three principals got through their task in a highly commendable manner—indeed, the entire rendering of the work was so smooth as to repay the close attention it received. Miss Janotha played a couple of short pieces with her usual success, and other contributors were the Countess Valda Gleichen, Madame Ella Russell, Miss Ribolla, Messrs. Whitney Mockridge, Denis O'Sullivan, Johannes Wolff (violin), and Mr. Sewell, the last-named acting as accompanist.

MISS ISABEL MACDOUGALL'S concert, on the 2nd ult., at St. James's Hall, was distinguished by the artistic nature of the programme and the excellence of its interpretation. Amongst the lyrics to which special interest was attached were "La Pavane" and "La Sarabande," from M. Bruneau's remarkable series of "Chansons à Danser," which were admirably sung by the concert-giver. Miss MacDougall also gave most expressive interpretations of Brahms's "An die Nachtigall" and Hans Schmidt's "Der Jäger," and was ably assisted by Mr. Gregory Hast, who also sang with refinement and taste a number of high-class songs, one of which, entitled "How shall I woo thee?" by Mr. S. Coleridge-Taylor, deserves to be widely known. Violin and pianoforte solos were contributed by Mr. Johann Kruse and Signorina Semiramide Colla, the latter a young pianist of promise.

THE annual festival of the Church Sunday Schools in connection with the Church of England Sunday School Institute was held at the Crystal Palace on the 11th ult. About 100 schools were represented, so that the Handel orchestra was crowded for the customary choral concert. Mr. H. Davan Wetton, organist of the Foundling Hospital, assisted by Mr. Harry Morgan, kept the large force well under control, steady and thoroughly effective performances being given of choruses, hymns, and part-songs. Bridge's setting of Tennyson's "Crossing the Bar" was sung with an observance of expression that was remarkable, considering the number of young persons engaged, and hearty approval was also earned for the delivery of Veazie's part-song "Wake! wake! wake!" Mr. F. W. Belchamber was at the organ.

MISS ELSA RUEGGER displayed great talent as a violoncellist at a concert in the Queen's (Small) Hall, on the 16th ult., in pieces by various composers. She was particularly successful in Gevaert's arrangement of a Concerto by Haydn in D, an admirable example of neat execution, and was also warmly complimented on a finished rendering of the Minuet of a Sonata in D by Locatelli. Her other contributions included a Romance in E flat by Hugo Becker, an Andante by Schumann, a Rondo by Boccherini, and Popper's "Spinnlied," the two latter very brightly played. Miss Margaret Reibold pleasingly rendered songs by Tschaïkowsky, Brahms, Rubinstein, and Schubert, and Mr. H. Whitney Tew was heard to advantage in Stanford's setting of "The Battle of Pelusium."

THE London Gregorian Choral Association held its twenty-eighth anniversary festival on the 2nd ult., in St. Paul's Cathedral. The choir totalled nearly a thousand, and several brass and wood-wind instruments were employed, in addition to the organ, played by Dr. C. Warwick Jordan. Psalm lxviii. was sung to Tone vii., 2; the Magnificat to Tone i., 2, Sarum form, and the Nunc dimittis to Tone v., 1, Sarum form, the last two harmonised by Dr. C. W. Pearce. There were several hymns, but nothing proved so impressive as Dr. Warwick Jordan's arrangement of the "Old Hundredth"—the second of his first set of three "Congregational Hymn Anthems"—sung with the utmost fervour by the vast assemblage.

MR. JOSEPH IVIMEY has recently been the recipient of two very gratifying tokens of appreciation of his invaluable services as conductor of the Surbiton and Weybridge orchestras. A very handsome spirit stand has been presented to him by the members of the orchestra "as a mark of their affection and esteem," while the leaders of the first and second violins gave their chief a silver-mounted baton. The Ivimey concerts are now in their tenth year, and the excellent results that have been obtained are due to the indefatigable exertions of the conductor, who deserves hearty congratulations upon the excellent work he has done in promoting the cause of good music in Surbiton.

HERR FELIX DREYSCHOCK, a well-known professor at Berlin, gave a pianoforte recital in the Queen's (Small) Hall, on the 17th ult., when he played works by Beethoven, Chopin, Godard, Liszt, and some slight compositions from his own pen. He did not bring out all the impulse and force of the first-named master's popular Sonata in C (Op. 53), with which the recital commenced, but in Chopin's Impromptu in F sharp and Fantasia in F minor he exhibited a delicacy and finish that made a favourable impression on the audience. The Valse (Op. 75) and Mazurka (Op. 127) of Godard were also played with the requisite grace and fancy.

THE Westminster Orchestral Society concluded its thirteenth season at the Westminster Town Hall, on the 1st ult., when Mr. Stewart Macpherson conducted meritorious performances of Weber's Overture to "Der Freischütz," Haydn's genial Symphony in D minor (No. 2), and three numbers from Tschaïkowsky's "Nut-cracker" ballet suite. Miss Katie Leonard, a young pianist, made a favourable impression by reason of the crisp and sympathetic touch with which she played the solo part of Weber's Concertstück, and Miss Agnes Nicholls sang with much acceptance.

MR. CAMPBELL ROWLAND, of Pietermaritzburg, son of the late Mr. A. C. Rowland, of Southampton, is now on a visit to the mother country. Previous to his departure for England Mr. Rowland was the recipient of a very gratifying expression of the esteem in which he is held at Maritzburg, where he has rendered excellent service to the cause of music for eighteen years. The testimonial, initiated by a brother organist, took the form of a cheque for £61 10s., subscribed for by about a hundred friends and well-wishers in the city, including the Dean, the Minister of Education, Crown Solicitor, and others.

MR. CHARLES GARDNER gave his annual matinée of chamber music at Queen's (Small) Hall on the 11th ult. The performers included Miss Jessie Gardner, who played a selection from the concert-giver's short suite (Op. 40); Mrs. Helen Trust and Signorina Gambogi, vocalists; Mr. Joseph Ludwig, violin; Mr. Paul Ludwig, violoncello, and the Sappho Vocal Quartet. Mr. Charles Gardner played two pianoforte solos by Beethoven and Schumann, and took part in Sterndale Bennett's genial chamber Trio in A for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello.

THE first performance of a comic opera, "Fantasio," by the gifted English composer, Miss E. M. Smyth, who is also the author of the libretto, took place at the Court Theatre, Weimar, on May 24, under the direction of Herr Stavenhagen. With a plot full of lively incident occurring in the "Kingdom of Herzegovina," and the clever and frequently very effective music wedded thereto, the piece scored a distinct success, and the composer, on its conclusion, was recalled many times.

HAYDN'S "Creation" was performed by the choral and orchestral classes connected with the Battersea Polytechnic Institute, on the 11th ult., under the experienced direction of Dr. Dunstan, head of the music department. Mr. Sinclair Dunn, professor of solo singing at the Institute, sang the tenor solos, and two of his pupils, Miss Florence Binns and Mr. W. W. Taylor, respectively interpreted the soprano and bass solo music in Haydn's genial work.

A NATIONAL testimonial to Mr. Sims Reeves has been initiated, which is to take the form of raising funds to purchase an annuity for the veteran tenor. The appeal for subscriptions has been signed by influential noblemen and gentlemen, headed by the Duke of Westminster. Subscriptions to the fund may be paid in at the London and South-Western Bank, Great Portland Street, or to the Hon. Secretary, Dr. Becher, 16, Montagu Street, Portman Square.

THE Orphanage Committee of the Incorporated Society of Musicians announce that there are now vacancies in the Orphanage, and that all orphans of professional musicians are equally eligible whether the parents were members of the Society or not. The Brighton Musical Fraternity has just given a generous and acceptable donation of twenty guineas to the Orphanage.

VIOLINISTS, whether professional or amateur, will be interested to hear that the beautiful Stradivarius belonging to Mdlle. Gabrielle Vaillant is to be sold, as the distinguished artist has been compelled by ill-health to retire from the active work of her profession. It is to be seen at Messrs. Hill and Sons', New Bond Street.

MR. HERBERT W. RENDELL, organist and choirmaster of the Parish Church, Wood Green, gave three recitals on the grand organ at the Alexandra Palace on the 3rd ult.

FOREIGN NOTES.

AMSTERDAM.—In celebration of the birth anniversary of Richard Wagner (May 22), two excellent performances of "Götterdämmerung" were given here by the Wagner Society, under the direction of M. Willem de Haan, the conductor of the Darmstadt Hof-Theater, and with the co-operation of several leading artists of that Institution. ——Two new sixteen-part choruses, entitled respectively "Hymne" and "Der Abend," by Herr Richard Strauss, were produced here, for the first time in public, on May 21, by the "à capella choir," under the direction of M. Averkamp.

BARMEN.—A new choral work by Herr Max Bruch, entitled "Gustavus Adolphus," was performed here for the first time, on May 22, under the composer's direction, and received with high favour.

BERLIN.—Lortzing's comic opera "Die beiden Schützen," which had not been given here for many years, was revived at the Royal Opera on May 29, and, on account chiefly of its exhilarating music, once more succeeded in gaining the favour of the audience. The long-lost manuscript of a posthumous opera by the same popular composer has recently been discovered. The work, which is in three acts and entitled "Regina," is to be produced at the Royal Theatre in the autumn. Herr Richard Strauss will assume his functions as conductor here on November 1. Madame Sigrid Arnoldson is giving a series of representations at the New Royal Opera House, and Mdlle. Prevosti is proving a highly attractive "star" at the West-End Theatre. At the latter Institution a new opera, "Der Schwarze Kaschka," by Herr Georg Jarno, was brought out on the 5th ult. with considerable success.——The concert season just come to a close here has again been a very busy one, some 200 afternoon and evening performances having taken place at the Bechstein Hall alone.——An interesting collection of the playbills of first performances of Wagner's music-dramas has lately been added to the Musical Exhibition now being held here, including the very rare one of the ill-fated first "Tannhäuser" production at the Paris Opéra.——A new Conservatorium has been established in the Charlottenburg district, with a highly efficient staff of professors, under the directorship of Herr Hermann Genss. Operatic and concert performances, with the co-operation of noted artists, are to be given in connection with the new Institution during the season.

BOLOGNA.—A new choral society, devoted to the cultivation of the classical masters of Italian Church music, has been founded here, and gave its first concert, on the 3rd ult., with a performance of Palestrina's "Stabat Mater."

CARLSRUHE.—Herr Felix Mottl (who, by the way, has declined the offer of the principal conductorship at the Munich Opera) has issued an invitation to amateur vocalists and music-lovers generally in this town to assist him in the formation of a grand choir for the purpose of regular choral performances to be given in connection with the concerts of the Court Theatre which have hitherto been chiefly orchestral. The performance of oratorio, for which the projected choir is specially intended, has been, so far, but little cultivated here, and a long-felt want will, it is hoped, be supplied by this new departure.

FRANKFORT-ON-MAIN.—The successful first performance took place, on the 5th ult., at the Stadt-Theater, of a new opera, "Das Erbe," by the Paris composer, F. von Erlanger.

HAMBURG.—A number of new works are to be brought out during the coming season at the Stadt-Theater, including Herr Bungert's "Circe," a four-act music drama, "Job," by the Munich composer, Richard Lederer, and "Mudallah," by Leborne. Wagner's "Der fliegende Holländer" and "Die Meistersinger," newly mounted, are to be conducted by Herr Siegfried Wagner.

LEIPZIG.—An interesting concert was given, on May 21, at the Gewandhaus, by Herr Carl Busch, conductor of the Philharmonic Orchestra of Kansas city (U.S.), who introduced a number of compositions from his own pen. Amongst these, two orchestral pieces, illustrating some episodes from Tennyson's "Idylls of the King," were very greatly appreciated, as was also an "American Rhapsody" by the same composer.——The performances of the "Nibelungen" tetralogy, "Die Meistersinger," and "Tristan und Isolde," without any of the hitherto customary "cuts," have recently met with signal success at the Stadt-Theater.

PARIS.—The first performance of "La Cloche du Rhin," lyrical drama in three acts by MM. Georges Montorgueil and P. B. Ghensi, the music by M. Samuel Rosseau, took place at the Opéra on the 8th ult. The composer, a former pupil of the Conservatoire, where he obtained the Prix de Rome in 1878, is chapelmaster of the Church of St. Clotilde and conductor of the choral forces in connection with the Concerts du Conservatoire. Mdlle. Ackté was an excellent representative of Hervine, the heroine, and Madame Héglon was equally successful in the part of Liba, a Teuton priestess, while the leading male part was admirably rendered by the tenor, M. Vaguet; MM. Bartet and Noté completing the cast.——The première, as far as the French capital is concerned, of Signor Giacomo Puccini's "La vie de Bohème," took place at the Opéra Comique on the 13th ult., and achieved a very considerable success. Mdlle. Guiraudon proved to be one of the most touching of Mimis and Mdlle. Tiphaine a highly amusing and likewise vocally excellent Musette, while M. Maréchal, as Rodolphe, and M. Bouvet, as Marcel, were admirable in their respective parts. The minor rôles were in the hands of some of the best artists of the Opéra Comique—to wit, MM. Fugère, Isnardon, Belhomme, Jacquet, and Barnolt.

ROME.—The excellent Società Orchestrale, founded by Ettore Pinelli, has been dissolved, after having but recently celebrated the twenty-fifth anniversary of its existence. ——The Trovatore publishes some interesting statistics regarding the artistic activity of some of the leading European operatic establishments during last year. According to this compilation, fifty-four different operatic works were produced in 1897 at the Berlin Opera House, representing the works of fifteen German, six French, and six Italian composers. At the Imperial Opera, Vienna, the number of works produced was fifty-three; of the composers, seventeen were of German and seven of French nationality. At the Paris Grand Opéra only nineteen works were performed, representing ten French composers, five German, and one Italian.

TURIN.—The first performance, in the composer's native country, of Verdi's new sacred compositions took place here on May 26, at the Exhibition Concert Hall, under the direction of Signor Toscanini. The "Hymn to the Virgin," the most highly appreciated of the numbers, had to be repeated.——A series of grand organ recitals is being given during the present International Exhibition here, at the Church del Gesù, where a magnificent new organ, built by Begezzi-Bossi, of Turin, has recently been opened. Several eminent organists have been engaged for the recitals, including MM. Guilmant, Bing, of Rome, and Clarence Eddy, the American organ virtuoso.

VENICE.—A new one-act opera, "Il Cieco," was most favourably received on its production, on May 23, at the Liceo Benedetto Marcello, the composer being the Maëstro Enrico Bossi, the director of that well-known Institution.

VIENNA.—After a somewhat prolonged absence from the stage of the Imperial Opera, Frau Lili Lehmann appeared here once more last month in some of her favourite parts, including Brünnhilde (in "Götterdämmerung"), Fidelio, and Isolde, her reception being a most brilliant one. The season here closed on the 12th ult., and the Opera will not re-open its doors until August 15, a somewhat longer vacation than usual. In the meantime, the musical director of that establishment, Herr Mahler, has induced the authorities to grant a considerable increase in the salaries of both the orchestra and the members of the chorus.——The old house in the Wipplinger Strasse inhabited by Mozart with his father in 1768, and again in 1782, soon after his marriage, has just been demolished to make room for a modern structure. Of the different places where the master had once resided in this capital only one, the house in the Schülerstrasse, now remains.——The rare distinction of the freedom of the City of Vienna has recently been conferred upon Dr. Hans Richter.

WEIMAR.—The interesting and valuable collection of Wagneriana of the late Anton Seidl is about to be transferred to the Weimar Museum, of which Institution it will in future form a part.——Herr Stavenhagen conducted his last Philharmonic concert here, on May 25, and will shortly take up his new duties as conductor of the Munich Opera.——Dr. Eduard Lassen, the well-known composer and Court Capellmeister here has completed the score of a ballet entitled "Diana," the scenarium of which had been sketched out by the poet Heine, as a sequel to his "Göttin im Exil," for the Italian Opera, London, during Lumley's management, but which has never been made use of. The new work is to be brought out at the Munich Opera.

WIESBADEN.—Miss Mary Howe, the excellent American soprano, who recently appeared here in favourite parts with great success, has been definitely engaged at the Royal Opera for the next two years.

OBITUARY.

WE regret to record the death of RICHARD LATTER, a well-known teacher of singing, which took place at Westbourne Lodge, Goldhawk Road, on the 2nd ult. Mr. Latter, who was born at Bromley, Kent, on July 22, 1823, received his musical education at the Royal Academy of Music, of which Institution he was made an Associate in 1849. He made his début in opera at the Princess's Theatre as Malatesta in "Don Pasquale," and also played in Birmingham, Manchester, and elsewhere up to 1851. He then settled in Aberdeen and became conductor of the Aberdeen Choral Union. In this capacity he introduced many leading artists of the day to the granite city, including Grisi, Mario, Sims Reeves, and Santley. He was a captain in the 1st Aberdeenshire Volunteers. Leaving Aberdeen in 1871, Mr. Latter came to London. He was appointed one of the professors at the opening of the Guildhall School of Music, where, up to the time of his death, he was a universal favourite. He also taught at the Royal Academy of Music and the Royal College of Music. The remains of Mr. Latter, who was a Freemason, were laid to rest in Kensal Green Cemetery.

The death is announced, on May 26, at Dresden, of EUGEN KRANTZ, the able director of the Royal Conservatorium in that capital, at the age of fifty-three. Born at Dresden in 1844, he studied under Dōring and Rietz, occupied the post of conductor of the chorus at the Royal Opera for some years as well as of the Lehrer-Gesangverein, and after holding a professorship at the Conservatorium for a considerable time, became its director in 1890. In this latter position Krantz developed rare administrative qualities, combined with indefatigable zeal and much tact, by virtue of which he greatly raised the status of the Institution.

EDOUARD JOSEPH MANGEOT, the well-known French musical journalist and mechanical inventor, died in Paris on May 31, aged sixty-four. A native of Nantes, he gained his practical experience at the pianoforte factory conducted in that town by his father, of which, on the latter's death, he became the chief. He was the inventor of the pianoforte with the double keyboard (à double clavier renversé), which caused such a sensation during the Paris Exhibition of 1878, and which was introduced soon after to London audiences by its exponent par excellence, the Chevalier de Kontski. In 1889 M. Mangeot founded the journal Le Monde Musicale, of which he was the editor, and which occupies a highly honourable position in contemporary French musical journalism.

Professor FERDINAND GLEICH, the doyen of Dresden musicians and musical authors, died at Langebrück, near the Saxon capital, on May 22, at the age of eighty-eight. He was a pupil of the Leipzig Conservatorium and was for a number of years associated with the management of the German Theatre in Prague. As musical critic of the Dresdener Anzeiger during a long period, his writings were much read, and his volumes, entitled "Die Hauptformen in der Musik" and "Handbuch der modernen Instrumentirung," are valuable contributions to theoretical musical literature.

On the 9th ult., at 8, Spenser Road, Herne Hill, FREDERICK LUCAS, late of Great Marlborough Street, died in his seventy-eighth year. Mr. Lucas was an accountant, who for many years chiefly practised amongst and for music firms, and was for many years one of the auditors of the Choir Benevolent Fund.

CORRESPONDENCE.

A SCOTCH VIOLINIST.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—With your permission I should like to correct a mistake in your biographical notice of Sir A. C. Mackenzie where it is stated that his father was the first Edinburgh musician that finished his education on the Continent.

Alexander Murray was a well-known violinist in Edinburgh and Scotland in the twenties and thirties. He was born at the commencement of the century, and finished his education on the Continent under Spohr, Baillot of Paris, and Mayseder of Vienna. He was well known here, having been soloist at several concerts (in the thirties) of the Belfast Anacreontic Society, and also at the opening concert in the Society's new Music Hall, in March, 1840. Good terms having been offered him by the Society as leader, he remained in this city until his death in 1846.

There were a number of Scotch musicians in Belfast when he came here, and they all agreed that Murray had not his equal in Scotland; and although the name of Mackenzie was mentioned, it was as a very promising violinist, he being only twenty then. As Murray left Scotland about seven years before Sir A. C. Mackenzie was born, and died before that event, it would not be strange if Sir Alexander had not heard of him

When in the Edinburgh Theatre Royal, in 1849, I was much struck with the elder Mackenzie's fine playing, and also with the fact that only overtures by the best composers were performed, no arrangements of operatic or national airs.—Yours obediently,

T. S.

Belfast, June 15 1898.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY AND COLONIAL NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

CHELMSFORD.—The Chelmsford Association of Church Choirs held its annual festival service in the Parish Church, on the 14th ult. The united choirs numbered about 300 voices, and they sang the service impressively, especially the Psalms, Frye's effective Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in B flat (written for the occasion), and Hall's anthem "Praise, my soul." Dr. G. F. Huntley presided at the organ and Mr. F. R. Frye conducted.

DURHAM.—The third symphony concert of the Durham Amateur Orchestral Society was given on May 26, in the Town Hall, when the varied programme included Haydn's "Oxford" Symphony, Mozart's Pianoforte Concerto in D minor (skilfully played by Miss Prust), Weber's "Oberon" Overture, and Gounod's Suite from "Philémon et Baucis." Mr. Duncanson sang Sterndale Bennett's "'Tis jolly to hunt" ("May Queen"). The orchestra acquitted itself with distinction under the baton of its excellent honorary conductor, Mr. Arthur Wallenstein. After the concert Mr. Wallenstein was presented with a Gladstone bag, a dressing case, and an illuminated address as tokens of esteem and appreciation of his untiring efforts.

EASTBOURNE.—Mr. George Langley, who is well-known as a lecturer on musical subjects, delivered a lecture on "Wagner: his life, work, and influence on opera," at the Pavilion, Devonshire Park, on the 9th ult. He concluded an interesting discourse by demonstrating in a very simple and lucid manner the splendid reforms Wagner effected in the domain of opera. Musical illustrations were artistically played by the lecturer.

ELY.—The Triennial Festival of Parish Choirs of the Diocese of Ely was held in the Cathedral, on the 8th ult., at 3 p.m. A total of 795 members of choirs attended, of whom 585 were surpliced and 210 unsurpliced; the orchestra consisted of ninety-four instruments. Mr. H. P. Allen, organist of the Cathedral, presided at the organ. The conductor was the Rev. L. Borissow, Precentor of Trinity College, Cambridge; and it is due to his careful work that the musical portion of the service proved so successful. The service included a Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in E flat, written for the occasion by Mr. T. W. Morley, organist of Pembroke College, Cambridge, which calls for special mention as being of marked interest throughout and particularly melodious and effective. The arrangements for the seating of the congregation and the choirs were in the hands of the Rev. J. H. Crosby, Precentor of Ely, and the excellent order and entire lack of confusion bear testimony to his skilful management.

Gloucester.—The annual festival of the Gloucester and Bristol Diocesan Choral Union was held in the Cathedral, on the 9th ult., when 920 voices, representing thirty-one choirs, took part in what was an exceedingly well-rendered service. The Magnificat and Nunc dimittis were Goss in E, the anthem was Mozart's "Plead Thou my cause," and Smart's Te Deum in F. The hymns included a new setting of "Forward be our watchword," specially composed for the occasion by Mr. A. Herbert Brewer, organist of the Cathedral, who, with Mr. T. W. G. Cooke, ably conducted the choirs. Mr. Ivor Morgan, deputy-organist of the Cathedral, discharged the very arduous and exacting labours of organist in a most praiseworthy manner.——Mr. W. H. Morgan, one of a family of highly talented musicians in the locality, gave an evening concert at the Shire Hall, on the 2nd ult., with conspicuous success. Miss Mary Morgan and Miss Gwynneth Morgan, as vocalists, and Miss Mildred Morgan, as violinist, gave great satisfaction by their respective performances, and Miss Kate Ould, as violoncellist, was also very acceptable. The accompaniments were most efficiently played by Mr. Ivor Morgan, assistant-organist of Gloucester Cathedral, a very youthful musician, who bids fair to make his mark in the musical world.

New Brighton.—Excellent orchestral concerts have been given daily during the past month at the New Brighton Tower, under the able direction of Mr. Granville Bantock. On Fridays special classical programmes have been presented, when symphonies such as Dvorák's "From the New World" and Tschaïkowsky's "Pathétique" have been admirably performed, in addition to an excellent Wagner selection. During July and August there is to be a Beethoven Symphony Cycle, when numbers one to eight of the "immortal nine" are to be presented. In addition, Rubinstein's "Ocean" Symphony will be given in its entirety.

Newcastle-on-Tyne.—At a meeting of the Amalgamated Guild of St. Peter's and Longbenton Choirs, held on the 16th ult., at St. Peter's Song School, Mr. T. W. Ritson, organist and choirmaster of St. Peter's, read an interesting paper on "Oratorio and its development." Examples from the works of Carissimi, Cavaliere, Schütz (Handel, being well known, was not represented), and Mendelssohn were rendered by Masters Hay, Ferry, Treby, and Fothergill; Messrs. Matt. B. Dixon (alto), W. J. Pletts (tenor), and H. O. Thompson (bass), of St. Peter's choir.

Plumstead.—At the Royal Assembly Rooms, on the 6th ult., a very successful performance of a MS. operetta, entitled "Primrose Dell," written by Mr. H. H. Clare and composed by Mr. Mutimer, was given, under the direction of the composer, by the pupils of the St. Michael's Schools, assisted by a professional orchestra. Great credit is due to the manner in which the little artists had been trained, their singing and acting in the tuneful work being much above the average at such entertainments. The second portion of the programme consisted of a concert in which Miss Amy Jones (soprano), Madame Kate Tester Jones (contralto), Mr. J. H. Ireland (tenor), Mr. Conrad Formes (bass), and Mr. Robert Pulleyn (solo cornet) took part. The accompanists were Madame Kate Tester Jones and Mr. Malcolm Mutimer.

Port Elizabeth, South Africa.—The first of a series of high class concerts was given on May 13, at the Liedertafel, by Mr. Horace Barton, organist of the Roman Catholic Pro-Cathedral, and Herr August Wilhelmj. The pianoforte solos comprised Schumann's Carnival and Chopin's Polonaise in A flat. Grieg's Sonata for violoncello and pianoforte was played for the first time here, the violoncellist being Mr. Percival Jackson. The vocal portion was sustained by Herr August Wilhelmj, who sang Walther's Preislied from "The Meistersinger," and songs by Schubert, Weber, &c.

Toowomba (Queensland).—A performance of the "Crucifixion," by Sir John Stainer, was given in St. Luke's Church, on April 6, under the skilful direction of Mr. Stanley Hobson. The choruses were sung in a manner which left nothing to be desired, and the solos were admirably sung by Mr. F. Gratton, Mr. Wooldridge, and Mr. Arthur Marlay. The work was repeated on Good Friday.

Organ Appointment.—Mr. H. G. Spackman, Organist and Music Master to Collegiate School, Wanganui, N.Z.

Choir Appointment.—Mr. Charles Calver (Tenor), to St. Paul's, Knightsbridge.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

G. H.—(1) For books on Acoustics consult Stone's "Scientific Basis of Music" (No. 11 of Novello's Music Primers); "Acoustics," by T. F. Harris (Curwen); Tyndall on "Sound" (Longman); and Sedley Taylor on "Sound and Music" (Macmillan). The great book on the subject is the "Sensations of Tone," by Helmholtz, translated by A. J. Ellis. (2) The following books on Musical Form are suggested: "Musical Form," by Prout; "Sonata Form," by W. H. Hadow (No. 54 of Novello's Music Primers); and the valuable article "Form," by Sir Hubert Parry, in Grove's "Dictionary of Music and Musicians," Vol. I., p. 541.

A Lover of Schubert.—The following works of Schubert are arranged for the organ and published by Novello and Company, Limited:—Eight Marches (various): Moderato, first movement, Sonata, Op. 42; Andante con moto from Symphony in C and the "Unfinished" Symphony (B minor); the Andantes from the Otetto; the Pianoforte Sonatas, Op. 120 (No. 3), Op. 122, Op. 147, Op. 164, and from the "Rosamunde" Ballet music; the Moments musicals, Op. 94, Nos. 2 and 6, &c.

Red.—(1) For books on choir-training (boys' voices) consult Martin's "The art of training choir boys" (No. 39 of Novello's Music Primers) and J. S. Curwen's "The boy's voice" (Curwen); (2) Bridge's "Organ accompaniment" (No. 27 of Novello's Music Primers); (3) "Organs and organ tuning," by Thomas Elliston (Weekes); (4) For "an advanced pedal exercise book" you could not do better than work through Best's "Art of Organ Playing," Part II., Studies for the Pedal (Novello).

Baritone.—"Selah." Sir John Stainer gives the following information in regard to this word: "The term Selah has been variously interpreted as indicating (1) a pause; (2) repetition (like Da Capo); (3) the end of a strophe; (4) playing with full power (fortissimo); (5) a bending of the body, an obeisance; (6) a short recurring symphony (a ritornello)." Of all these the last seems the most probable.

Student.—The metronome rate of "$\overset{1}{\mathcal{J}}$. = 116" for a concert performance of Chopin's B flat minor Scherzo is not too fast in the hands of a skilful performer; but in an examination speed is not everything. A "clear and intelligent reading," to use your own words, is the first consideration, and, allowing for these conditions, the faster you can play it than $\overset{1}{\mathcal{J}}$. = 96, so much the better.

Banestra.—Reubke's Organ Sonata in C minor is one of those pieces which should be played with a good deal of tempo rubato, and therefore it is almost beyond the range of metronome indications. "Weniger stark und ruhiger" means "less loud, and quieter"; "nicht schleppend," "not dragging." Play the chords on p. 12 exactly as written.

E. M.—We fear the age you mention for commencing a course of study is rather too advanced in order to attain the best results. But under a thoroughly good teacher and with persevering practice there is no reason why satisfactory progress should not be made.

SONATINA.—The following works for the organ are, speaking generally, in Sonata form and not difficult of execution. Organ Sonatas by Christian Fink and Franz Lachner. Also first and second "Sonata da Camera," by Dr. A. L. Peace.

J. D.—The "composer Ad Mouters," to whom you refer, is probably M. François Adolphe Wouters, now principal professor of the pianoforte at the Brussels Conservatoire. He was born May 28, 1841. Gounod was born June 17, 1818.

THE ROLLING SEASONS.

A New Harvest Cantata. By CALEB SIMPER.

4th 1,000. Price 1s. 6d. net. Tonic Sol-fa, 1s. net.

Band Parts are also printed for Strings, Flute, Oboe, Clarinet, Bassoon, 2 Horns, 2 Cornets, 2 Trombones, Timpani, and Organ.

With the exception of two Hymns and a Carol, the words are selected from the Holy Scriptures. The music, both Vocal and Instrumental, is attractive, interesting, and not difficult. It requires Four Soloists and Full Chorus, and occupies 35 minutes in performance. This Cantata may be rendered with Organ Accompaniment only, but the Orchestral Parts add greatly to the effect. It is especially suitable for Church use at Harvest-tide.

This favourite Cantata has already been performed with great success in England, Scotland, Ireland, Wales, Channel Islands, America, Australia, Cape Colony, &c. A list of "Opinions" from the Clergy and Conductors may be obtained of the Publishers.

CONNLA

A DRAMATIC CANTATA

THE WORDS WRITTEN BY

JAMES SMIETON, M.A.

THE MUSIC COMPOSED FOR

THREE SOLO VOICES, CHORUS, & ORCHESTRA

BY

JOHN MORE SMIETON.

Vocal Score, 2s. 6d.
Full Score and Band Parts on hire.

(The work takes about eighty minutes to perform, and is adapted for Festival and the larger Choral Societies.)

"Space prevents us from noticing in detail this interesting work. The music, in which Scandinavian influence is perceptible, is fresh and imaginative. There is a great variety of rhythm; and the epithet 'dramatic' in the title is quite appropriate."—The Musical Times.

"A new work of real power and grit is John More Smieton's Cantata 'Connla.' . . . The music flows natural and transparent, as do the words; and, taken altogether, the work is admirable in the arrangement of its matter and the clearness of its treatment. Conductors and choirmasters should not fail to procure copies of this new and distinctly notable production."—Musical Opinion.

F. MENDELSSOHN BARTHOLDY.

PREFACE.

Mendelssohn composed his "Six Organ Sonatas" at the request of Messrs. Coventry and Hollier, Music Publishers (then carrying on business at 71, Dean Street, Soho), acting upon the initiative of some English organists who were familiar with his masterly performances on the organ in London and Birmingham. In a letter written to his publishers in London, and dated Frankfort, December 17, 1844, Mendelssohn says (in English): "I hope to send you soon the promised organ pieces. Nine are ready, but I want to have twelve before I make a parcel of them."

The two pieces forming the present publication have been selected from those that remained unpublished of the "parcel" referred to by Mendelssohn. They are now printed for the first time from the original manuscripts preserved in the Royal Library at Berlin.

In preparing these two pieces for publication, expression marks, metronomic rates, and stop registration have been suggested, there being no such directions in the original autographs.

VIOLIN

BY

AUGUST WILHELMJ

AND

JAMES BROWN

SECTION I.—TECHNICAL PRACTICE
(IN SIX BOOKS).

SECTION II.—STUDIES
(IN SIX BOOKS).

Section I. deals exclusively with the important subject of Daily Technical Practice, and contains a sufficient supply of material for the gradual and steady development of fingering, bowing, intonation, the positions, &c. This Section is issued separately, in six Books, arranged in progressive order, and, incorporated therein (it may be added), will be found all the Scales, Arpeggi, &c., which are needed by Candidates entering for the Associated Board and other Examinations.

Section II. is formed of a series of original and selected Studies, in six Books. In point of difficulty the Books are carefully co-ordinated with the similarly numbered Books of Section I., and are intended to be used concurrently with them.

In close connection with "A Modern School for the Violin" it is furthermore intended by the authors to issue an extensive repertory of Pieces suitable for teaching, the majority of them selected from the works of acknowledged Masters, and all calculated to encourage the Student and to further the development of a good style. Each piece will be separate, with pianoforte accompaniment, and the violin parts will be furnished with complete marks for fingering, bowing, and expression.

A HANDBOOK OF EXAMINATIONS IN MUSIC

CONTAINING

600 QUESTIONS WITH ANSWERS

BY

ERNEST A. DICKS,

Fellow of the Royal College of Organists, Member of the Incorporated Society of Musicians, &c.

The scope of this book covers the whole ground of theoretical examinations in music. It supplies an invaluable equipment to candidates entering for the various Local Examinations in Musical Knowledge held periodically throughout the country, and it will be found extremely useful to those who are preparing for the higher grades of Diploma and Degree Examinations.

The book is therefore very comprehensive. Its range includes questions and answers in Theory, Harmony, Counterpoint, Form, Fugue, Acoustics, Musical History, Organ Construction, and Choir Training.

By no means the least valuable part of the volume is that section, consisting of upwards of one hundred pages, which contains reprints of past examination papers set by the Associated Board, Trinity College, and the Incorporated Society of Musicians; the Universities of Oxford, Cambridge, Dublin, and Durham; The Royal Academy of Music, The Royal College of Music, and The Royal College of Organists. The advantage of having so many specimens of these actual examination papers within one cover is too obvious to need further comment or commendation.

Price, cloth, Three Shillings and Sixpence.

PREFACE.

The words of these Four-and-Twenty little Songs have been selected from Mr. Norman Gale's delightful volume of Children's Poems. A few modifications of the original text have been made in order to facilitate their musical rendering.

Though in the first instance, no doubt, the songs will be mainly sung to children rather than by them, the Composer's aim has been to observe such conditions in his settings as to make it easy for children to join in singing them themselves. With this object he has endeavoured to furnish simple, rhythmical melodies of a suitable compass, and it will be found that in the case of sixteen out of the twenty-four songs the vocal range is confined to the octave, whilst in only three instances does it exceed nine notes.

THE SONGS IN DON GIOVANNI

COMPOSED BY

MOZART.

EDITED, WITH MARKS OF EXPRESSION AND PHRASING,

BY

ALBERTO RANDEGGER.

PREFACE.

Mozart's keen appreciation of the subtleties of the words he set to music is often so evident that, without a thorough understanding of their significance, it would be impossible to sing the music—to the spirit of which the words are closely allied—in strict accordance with the composer's intention.

With a view to meeting this difficulty a special English version has been adapted, to express, as nearly as possible, the literal meaning of the original Italian text.

In these translations no attempt has been made at versification, and they do not claim any literary merit, but they may be used in singing the songs, if desired.

In any case they will prove valuable to singers who are not familiar with the Italian language.

The alterations, cadences, &c., added in small type over the original music, are used by many eminent artists. The Editor, however, does not hold himself responsible for them, and leaves their adoption or rejection to the taste and discretion of the singer.

A NEW EDITION OF

THE RUINS OF ATHENS

A CANTATA

L. VAN BEETHOVEN

THE ENGLISH WORDS WRITTEN AND ADAPTED BY

PAUL ENGLAND.

Price One Shilling and Sixpence.

Full Score and Orchestral Parts, for use with this Edition, may be had on hire from the Publishers.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

It has been changed into a cantata, with English words, written or adapted by Mr. Paul England, the object being to place Beethoven's music in the hands of our choral societies. . . . The result shows a purpose completely achieved, and Messrs. Novello may depend upon a good reward for their enterprise. Such is the beauty of the music—Greek-like in its simple outline—that the cantata will spread rapidly over the country, the more because so much of it is already well-known.

DAILY NEWS.

The chorus of Dervishes, sung by about 500 of the tenors and basses of the Royal Choir, was encored by acclamation; and if Sir Frederick had cared to accept it a similar fate might have befallen the Turkish March and the delicious Interlude. Even still better was the performance of the final chorus, with its curious reminiscences of Mozart and of the prison chorus in "Fidelio." Altogether the revival was a notable one.

DAILY CHRONICLE.

It was a treat to hear music at once so solid and so graceful. "The Ruins of Athens" is not to be ranked among Beethoven's highest achievements, though none but he could have made such effective use of the barbaric element in the chorus of Dervishes—a taking air, emphasised by the wildest accompaniment. . . . The quaint Turkish March and the chorus, with which the work reaches a majestic termination, were also warmly applauded, but nothing—not even the elegant march and chorus, "Twine ye the garlands"—told so well as the impulsive number for the Dervishes, which was rendered with appropriate vigour and energy. . . . As the work is now made suitable for the concert platform, it should be adopted by all choral societies anxious to include in their répertoires compositions of the highest class.

WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.

Considering the rubbishy character of the productions which so frequently secure the attention of local choirs, it is indeed astonishing that such a beautiful work as this of Beethoven should have been neglected so assiduously—though doubtless the absence hitherto of any decent arrangement of the work for this purpose has had something to do with the matter. With the preparation of such an arrangement as that used last night, however, this difficulty has been overcome, and it may be assumed that henceforward the work, which contains some of Beethoven's most graceful and spontaneous choral writing, will be heard more often.

ATHENÆUM.

It is needless to state that the music of "Die Ruinen von Athen" does not display Beethoven in a lofty mood, the master keeping in his lightest manner from the first bar to the last. Consequently there was no serious strain on the executants on Wednesday, and the choral numbers were rendered with power and spirit, the favourite Dervishes' chorus being, of course, encored.

THE

GATE OF LIFE

DRAMATIC CANTATA

FOR

Soprano, Tenor, and Bass Soli, Chorus, and Orchestra

THE VERSE WRITTEN BY

SHAPCOTT WENSLEY

THE MUSIC COMPOSED BY

FRANCO LEONI.

PRICE TWO SHILLINGS.

String Parts (in the Press). Wind Parts and Full Score, MS.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

The story, which in some form or other has often been set to music, is a variant of that we find in Benedict's "Saint Cecilia," Sullivan's "Martyr of Antioch," &c., but it seems to be one which has interest for the public, and is not without inspiration for composers. Mr. Leoni, at any rate, has set to it strains which won over their first audience to warm demonstrations of sympathy. . . . Choral societies will find "The Gate of Life" most useful.

STANDARD.

It must be gladly conceded at once that the score shows the hand of a musician who can write with taste and freshness in feeling. The heathen choruses and dances in the first of the three brief parts, the hymn of the Christians, in which the French device of singing with closed lips is adopted, and the final scene of the martyrdom, display full knowledge of effect.

DAILY NEWS.

Comparatively simple and unsophisticated music of this sort, sometimes recalling Gounod, sometimes the Italians, but almost always melodious and pretty, would be far better suited to the country choirs, the more especially as it presents few difficulties and employs only three soloists.

MORNING POST.

There are some attractive numbers in Signor Leoni's score. The opening chorus and the dances that follow are bright and piquant. . . . The hymn sung in prison is pleasing, and the organ is effectively introduced at the close.

GLOBE.

The cantata is not very remarkable for originality of ideas or treatment, and seems better fitted for performance by country musical societies than by a leading London choir. . . . Its fluent writing and thorough knowledge of conventional orchestral devices are points which will probably recommend it to some amateurs, and the excellent way in which the choral numbers were sung by the choir proved that the music was thoroughly appreciated by the performers.

ST. JAMES'S GAZETTE.

Its music is light, bright, tuneful, and dramatic, with a certain resemblance to the writing of Mascagni, Puccini, and Leoncavallo.

ATHENÆUM.

The music is mainly in the modern Italian style as regards phrasing and orchestration, and is written in a manner that cannot fail to prove grateful to performers.

DAILY GRAPHIC.

The choir revelled in the music, which they sang with no less skill than enjoyment, and the vast majority of the audience applauded, wherever there was an opportunity to applaud, with the utmost enthusiasm. The reasons for this success are not far to seek. Mr. Leoni's melodies are of unimpeachable suavity, with the added attraction of possessing a strong family likeness to favourite numbers by a variety of popular composers, from Wagner to Mascagni.

MR. GORDON HELLER

(BARITONE)

A.R.C.M. (Double Diploma).

20, Blenheim Terrace, Leeds.

MR. CHARLES KNOWLES

(YORKSHIRE BARITONE)

Of the Crystal Palace and principal Provincial Concerts.

"ST. PAUL."—WEDNESBURY CHORAL SOCIETY.—"In the title-rôle Mr. Charles Knowles made from first to last an excellent impression upon his listeners. The sympathetic rendering of the devotional air 'O God, have mercy,' and, in marked contrast, his splendid interpretation of the fiery 'Consume them all,' showed him to be a vocalist of very high merit. We shall hope to hear him again."—Wednesbury Herald, May 7, 1898.

"The success of the evening was centred in Mr. Charles Knowles, who, we believe, has never been heard in Wednesbury before, but who created an excellent impression some time ago at Walsall. He comes from Yorkshire and possesses all the manly actions and the vigorous style which characterise the Northerner, whilst his singing on this occasion was of high order, so much so that he aroused his audience from coldness to the highest enthusiasm. In the spirited parts he gave them with fine attack and in grand style, while in the subdued music he was equally successful, and showed that he was not without the spirit of an artist."—Midland Advertiser, May 7, 1898.

"FALKA."—GRAND THEATRE, LEEDS, Easter Week.—"With a good voice at his command Mr. Charles Knowles gave a fine portrayal of the bold and impetuous Boleslas, and his two chief songs were very effectively rendered."—Yorkshire Post, April 12, 1898.

"CREATION" AT ARMLEY.—"Mr. Knowles is the possessor of a magnificent voice, and what nature has done for him he has supplemented with a careful training, the result being most satisfactory."—Armley News, April 15, 1898.

GRAUN'S "PASSION" MUSIC, LEEDS.—"Mr. Charles Knowles was excellent in the bass solos and gave a particularly vigorous reading of the fine air 'As stands a lofty mountain.'"—Yorkshire Post, April 2, 1898.

"Whilst Mr. Charles Knowles gave a vigorous rendering of the fine, bold, and in its way dramatic solo, 'As stands a lofty mountain.'"—Leeds Mercury, April 2, 1898.

"CREATION."—TONG CHORAL SOCIETY.—"Mr. Knowles justified his engagement by a really admirable rendering of the solos allotted to him."—Bradford Observer, March 24, 1898.

"Mr. Charles Knowles sings with a good deal of dramatic power, and employs a capital voice with other evidences of technical accomplishment, and he was certainly not behind the others in the degree of favours won. His recitatives were very well sung indeed, and in the two airs which fall to the part, 'Rolling in foaming billows' and 'Now heaven in fullest glory,' he was accorded the heartiest plaudits."—Cleckheaton Guardian, March 25, 1898.

"JUDAS MACCABÆUS."—"The bass solos were given with admirable effect by Mr. Charles Knowles, who possesses a sonorous and well-trained voice. 'Arm, arm, ye brave,' was given with much spirit, and his vocal capacity was well exhibited in the somewhat florid passage 'The Lord worketh wonders.'"—Yorkshire Post, February 7, 1898.

BALLAD CONCERT AT WORCESTER.—"Mr. Charles Knowles has a bass voice of exceptional quality and purity of tone, and be no doubt was the star of the evening. He sang two solos, for both of which he was encored, Mendelssohn's 'I am a roamer' and Emanuel's 'The Desert.' In the latter song he fairly surpassed the highest expectation, and the audience followed with almost breathless interest the theme of the composition. For encores he gave 'The devout lover' and 'Father O'Flynn.'"—Worcestershire Advertiser, November 27, 1897.

"BOHEMIAN GIRL."—"Mr. Thornton's performance of the part could not be excelled."—Todmorden News.

"ELIJAH."—"His singing was uniformly brilliant."—Skipton Pioneer.

BALLADS.—"A rich baritone voice of rare power and compass."—Liverpool Daily Post.

BALLADS.—"The finest bass that has ever visited Workington."—Mr. Furnace's Concerts.

BALLADS.—"The best baritone heard at these concerts for many years.—Mossley Reporter.

"SAMSON."—"We have never heard the bass solos sung better. If indeed, so well."—Huddersfield Examiner.

SECTION I.—TECHNICAL PRACTICE
(In Six Books).
SECTION II.—STUDIES
(In Six Books).

Section I. deals exclusively with the important subject of Daily Technical Practice, and contains a sufficient supply of material for the gradual and steady development of fingering, bowing, intonation, the positions, &c. This Section is issued separately, in six Books, arranged in progressive order, and, incorporated therein (it may be added), will be found all the Scales, Arpeggi, &c., which are needed by Candidates entering for the Associated Board and other Examinations.

Section II. is formed of a series of original and selected Studies, in six Books. In point of difficulty the Books are carefully co-ordinated with the similarly numbered Books of Section I., and are intended to be used concurrently with them.

In close connection with "A Modern School for the Violin" it is furthermore intended by the authors to issue an extensive repertory of Pieces suitable for teaching, the majority of them selected from the works of acknowledged Masters, and all calculated to encourage the Student and to further the development of a good style. Each piece will be separate, with pianoforte accompaniment, and the violin parts will be furnished with complete marks for fingering, bowing, and expression.

SECTION I. BOOK I. NOW READY.
Price Two Shillings net.
SECTION II. BOOK I. (In the Press.)

With this number are presented gratis Extra Supplements, consisting of an Anthem for Harvest, entitled, "Sing unto the Lord," by Cuthbert Harris; an Anthem for four voices, "A prayer for peace," by Dr. William Crotch, arranged by Sir John Stainer; and a Portrait of Professor Karl Klindworth, specially taken for this paper by Messrs. Russell and Sons.

THE MUSICAL TIMES
AND SINGING-CLASS CIRCULAR.
AUGUST 1, 1898.

KARL KLINDWORTH.

It was during an early morning walk across Hampstead Heath, before breakfast, that Professor Klindworth related the following "ups and downs" of his life. "When I am at home," he says, "I always get up at half-past five, winter and summer, and go for a walk, whatever the weather may be." He follows this practice, though at a somewhat later hour, during his sojourn in London. No wonder that he revels in the beauties of our delightful "northern height" on this lovely June morning while taking his matutinal "constitutional." His sixty-eight years sit lightly upon him. He has an alertness and vigour that many a young man might envy. In a notice of Mr. Frederick Dawson's recent concert, conducted by Professor Klindworth, a contemporary said: "This old man [Klindworth], so feeble that he could hardly walk on to the platform without assistance, puts to shame many of our younger and more fashionable conductors." This promptly drew forth a challenge from the "old man"—that he would be delighted to run a race with the critic on Hampstead Heath, any morning at six o'clock! The challenge has not been accepted. Upon returning from the walk, and at the pleasant breakfast-table of his kind host and hostess, it was interesting to learn that the Professor is not only a vegetarian, but practically a total abstainer. He attributes his recovery from an almost fatal illness to the adoption of a strict vegetarian diet, and his wonderful health to the advantages arising from a simple and strictly abstemious mode of life. The rarity of such methods of daily sustenance, at all events amongst professional musicians, is sufficient apology for referring to so personal a matter. Is not his example worthy of thoughtful consideration?

Karl Ludwig Klindworth was born at Hanover, September 25, 1830. His father was a clever engineer and optician, a lover of all forms of art, a player on several instruments, and a good singer. Young Karl was self-taught in regard to the pianoforte. At a party given on his mother's birthday he played the Overture to the "Caliph of Bagdad" (Boieldieu) when he was six years old. But the violin was the instrument of his boyhood. Studying it under a careful master, he attained to a considerable degree of virtuosity. He played the concertos of Rode, Molique, and Vieuxtemps, the Fantasias and Studies of Paganini and Ernst, and in all the quartets by the great masters. He was passionately fond of singing (he sang all the ballads of Löwe) and especially of playing the pianoforte scores of operas; he would pass the whole day, from morning till night, in this engrossing occupation. Karl first became acquainted with the music of Wagner in a typically boyish way. When he was fifteen he was attracted to a folio volume by reason of its unusual bulkiness! "What's this?" he enquired with youthful curiosity. It proved to be "Rienzi," which, as usual, he eagerly played and studied. "As a boy," says the Professor, "I was always fond of scores. Not being able to get any from the library, I copied no end of them—'Der Freyschütz,' 'Don Juan,' 'The Huguenots,' the Ninth Symphony, and the quartets of Beethoven from the parts, all such work being of the greatest advantage to me in after life. 'Why did I leave the violin?' Well, I wanted to study under Spohr; but my father's large family, with his reverse of fortune at the time, compelled me to apply to King August, of Hanover, for money to help me. But my request was refused.

OPERA CONDUCTOR AT SEVENTEEN.

"Having entered my seventeenth year, the question of my livelihood became very urgent. Ultimately, in September, 1847, I became the conductor of a travelling opera troupe. When in Silesia, one of my first-violin players was Benjamin Bilse, fourteen years older than myself, and afterwards a famous conductor in Berlin. We toured about for two years in different parts of Germany. As we had only one orchestral rehearsal for each performance, and a small orchestra, I had to be very alert in adapting the instrumentation to my limited resources. Wagner afterwards said to me: 'That experience gave you your great "routine," self-possession and command over the orchestra.'" It would seem as if young Klindworth was to have followed the career of an opera conductor. In 1849 he was engaged to conduct a German opera troupe at Amsterdam, but on the way thither he received a telegram that the venture had "gone smash." Thereupon he returned to his native city (Hanover), where he gave lessons; but he soon gave up the violin and took to the pianoforte.

A PUPIL OF LISZT'S.

Klindworth, when on a concert tour, met Liszt at Eilsen, a bathing-place in Hanover, where the great pianist was then staying. "Liszt was very charming," says Professor Klindworth, "and was quite the 'grand seigneur.' He asked me to play something, adding 'play this to me,' which proved to be his concert study in D flat in manuscript. My youthful love of reading at sight was of great service to me at such a moment. I was very sharp at it, and Liszt was pleased. 'I will play it to you now,' he said, which he did in a wonderful manner, and he invited our quartet party to stay to supper. I had a great desire to study with Liszt at Weimar and I wrote to him to that effect. In reply came a letter from Joachim Raff, his secretary, saying that I was to go to Weimar and show myself. I remember that when I played before Liszt, Bülow and Joachim and others who were present, all smiled at my modest attempts; but somehow or other Liszt took a fancy to me. But I had no money! I therefore applied to King George, of Hanover, for some pecuniary assistance towards the prosecution of my studies. His Majesty, through his gentleman-in-waiting, said that he would be pleased to give the sum of about £7 10s., but only on the understanding that no further request should be made! What was the good of £7 10s.? But a lady of the Jewish faith who believed in me said: 'I'll lend you the money without interest.' In rendering me this kindness she had to make some sacrifice, as she was by no means well off. In the summer of 1852 I went to Weimar, where I studied under Liszt for two years. One of my fellow students was Hans von Bülow, from that time forward to the end of his days my true and devoted friend. Raff was exceedingly kind to me; and his highly intelligent and noble mind proved of great value to my future development." In addition to the inestimable advantage Klindworth enjoyed in studying under so great a master as Liszt during two very impressionable years of his life, he breathed the air of that rarefied artistic atmosphere at Weimar which strongly influenced his after career.

LIFE AT WEIMAR.

"My companions at Weimar," says Professor Klindworth, "were Peter Cornelius, Ferdinand Laub, and Bernhard Cossmann. Liszt's visitors included the two Wieniawskis, Marx, and Moscheles; Ferdinand David and Brendel from Leipzig; Brahms, who brought his three sonatas and other compositions to show Liszt, previous to his submitting them to Schumann; Bettina von Arnim (the young friend of Goethe and Beethoven) and her two charming daughters; Berlioz, whose visit was the occasion of a Berlioz Festival, when performances took place of his "Benvenuto Cellini," "Faust," and "Romeo and Juliet." There being a difficulty in finding sufficient orchestral players, we young fellows placed ourselves at Liszt's disposal—Hans von Bülow played the big drum, Dionys Pruckner the triangle, myself the cymbals, and we obtained high commendation on our infallibility from no less a personage than the great Hector himself."

LONDON.

Having finished his studies with Liszt, through want of funds, the young artist of twenty-three summers did not know what to do to make a living; moreover, he had to repay the loan of his kind benefactress. He determined to come to London, where he arrived in the spring of 1854, armed with several letters of introduction. One of these letters was from the Duke of Saxe-Coburg to his brother the Prince Consort. The Prince's secretary replied to the effect that Herr Klindworth's name had been placed on the list of artists to play at the Court concerts, but his chance of appearing at them would be somewhat remote, as the applicants were so numerous. Two years afterwards Klindworth again wrote, but he received no reply. Another letter was to Lady Granville, sister of the French Ambassador, who took practical compassion on the young German by becoming his pupil. M. Bruzaud, of Erard's, supplied him with a pianoforte.

MR. J. W. DAVISON'S CRITICISM.

Professor Klindworth made his first public appearance in London at one of John Ella's "Musical Winter Evenings." The date was March 30, 1854, the place Willis's Rooms, when the "pupil of Liszt" played Beethoven's Sonata in C (Op. 2, No. 3) and Liszt's Fantasia on Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream." "This young man," said Ella in the previous programme, "comes with good testimonials from Joachim, and his master—the Hungarian magnate, Liszt, under whom Klindworth has studied two years at Weimar." Mr. J. W. Davison, the great critic of the day, who was not particularly genial in the reception he accorded to pianists not of English make, thus criticised Herr Klindworth's performances in the Musical World. (The date of the paper, the 1st of April, 1854, should be noted):—

A new pianist, Herr Klindworth, a pupil of M. Liszt, made his début on this occasion. He played twice—Beethoven's Sonata in C (No. 2 of the Haydn set), and a fantasia by M. Liszt, on the two themes of Mendelssohn's Wedding March in A Midsummer Night's Dream. Herr Klindworth is evidently young, and at present his talent does not look very promising. He exhibits the faults of his master with none of his beauties. He thumps the instrument with right good will, and is by no means exact in his execution. His mechanism, indeed, is very defective; and this was even more clearly shown (less clearly, if you please) in the fantasia of Liszt, which is one of the most difficult, and at the same time one of the most incoherent and unmeaning bravura pieces to which we ever listened. Liszt must have had some spite against Mendelssohn when he wrote it. There should have been some heavy tax upon these fantasia-makers, to prevent them from mangling and caricaturing the works of great masters.

We did not like Herr Klindworth's reading of Beethoven's Sonata. It was exaggerated in expression and incorrect. The best points were the scales in sixths and thirds, which are the prominent features in the theme of the finale; these were well and crisply executed; but all the rest was "leather and prunella." Mr. Ella has not been fortunate in his new protégé. He could have found a great many more legitimate and even skilful players at the Royal Academy of Music in Tenterden Street. We are sorry for Mr. Ella, and still more so for Herr Klindworth; but we must speak the truth.

HARD TIMES IN LONDON.

Professor Klindworth had some very hard and rough times during the early part of his residence in London, but he had many kind friends. The keeper of a German restaurant in Old Compton Street, Soho, Schütz by name, took compassion on his hungry fellow countryman by giving him an open invitation to dine there "on tick," to quote the Professor. At that time he lived in Manchester Street, Manchester Square, and his means were often so limited that he would take his supper at a neighbouring public-house at a cost of twopence for the meal—bread and cheese 1d., and a glass of porter "at the same price." It is not altogether surprising to learn that at times he underwent great sufferings. But in the midst of his struggles and physical weakness there came to him a friend who was the means of procuring for him a European reputation.

LISZT AND WAGNER—TRUE FRIENDS.

One day the invalid musician received a call from Richard Wagner, at that time (1855) in London as conductor of the Philharmonic Society's concerts. Liszt, in view of Wagner's visit to London, had written in the highest terms of his former pupil, Karl Klindworth. Here is an extract from one of Liszt's letters to Wagner, written previous to the latter's visit to London, and couched in terms of warmest appreciation:—

I commend you to Klindworth, a Wagnerian de la veille. He is an excellent musician and also a splendid pianist, who studied with me at Weimar for eighteen months. . . . As far as I know there is no pianist in London like him; but, on account of his determined and open sympathy with the so-called "music of the future," he has placed himself in a somewhat awkward position towards the Philistines and handicraftsmen there.

Wagner to Liszt, dated "London, April 5 [1855]. 8.30, evening":—

Klindworth has just played your sonata to me. . . . He astonished me by his playing; no lesser man could have ventured to play your work to me for the first time. He is worthy of you. Surely it was beautiful!

Wagner to Liszt, dated "Zurich, July 5, 1855," after Wagner's visit to London:—

Klindworth was to play a concerto by Henselt at the last New Philharmonic concert, conducted by Berlioz. . . . I sincerely pity him. He is a great deal too much of an artist and a high-minded man not to be and always remain very unhappy in London. He should try something else.

In another letter, written from London to his friend Otto Wesendonck, Wagner says:—

I have also taken a great fancy to a young musician named Klindworth, whom Liszt recommended to me. If the fellow had a tenor voice I should most certainly kidnap him, because, apart from that, he meets every requirement for my Siegfried, especially in regard to physique.

WAGNER IN LONDON.

During his memorable visit to London in 1855, as conductor of the Philharmonic concerts, Wagner occupied apartments at 22, Portland Terrace, on the North side of Regent's Park. The house, with its front garden, still stands and is seemingly unaltered. Wagner, whose love of animals is well known, was therefore in close proximity to the Zoo. "I shall often go and see the wild beasts," he wrote. One of his great delights was to "feed the ducks" from the bridge over the ornamental water in Regent's Park. "Wagner liked me from the beginning," relates Professor Klindworth. "On one of the occasions when I visited him at Portland Terrace, Berlioz, then in London, was expected. There had been an estrangement between the two composers, but the reconciliation took place in London. Wagner said to me, 'When Berlioz comes into the room play something from his "Romeo and Juliet,"' which I did. On another, and, to me, very memorable occasion, I found him standing at a high desk busily at work scoring the second act of 'Die Walküre' in his London lodgings. He was then writing the Introduction, and I discovered him to be in a very joyful mood. I asked him to let me take a few of the pages away with me to experimentally make a pianoforte arrangement. He consented, and this was the beginning of my task in arranging, from the complicated full score, a pianoforte accompaniment to the complete cycle of 'Der Ring des Nibelungen.'" "Klindworth," wrote Wagner to Liszt from London, "has made a pianoforte arrangement of the first act of the 'Walküre,' which he plays beautifully."

"There were two losses in connection with my arrangements of the 'Ring.' The first was the first act of 'Siegfried,' which I had made in London. When, after some years, Wagner recommenced the work, he could not find my arrangement and I had to re-write it. A yet more serious loss was that of my pianoforte arrangement of the second half of the second act of 'Götterdämmerung.' When I did that section I was living at Moscow. I sent my manuscript directed to Wagner at Bayreuth. The Bavarian town was evidently unknown to the Russian post office officials, because the packet found its way to Beyrout, in Syria! There it remained for a year, and when it ultimately reached Wagner he had to pay about twelve shillings for postage. I had therefore to do my work all over again, under extreme pressure, in time for the performances. This I did during my summer visit to Wagner at Bayreuth, in young Siegfried's bedroom at Wahnfried, at the early morning hours of from six to eight o'clock. Wagner also once lost a page or two of the full score of the Schmiedelieder in 'Siegfried,' and he used to speak of the great trouble he had in recomposing the lost portion. You may be interested to know that Wagner gave me his autograph scores of both 'Das Rheingold' and 'Die Walküre'; the former I still possess, but the latter I have given to Madame Wagner."

WAGNER AND THE PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

"Can you recall any incidents in connection with Wagner's conductorship of the Philharmonic?" we ask the Professor in the neighbourhood of the "Spaniards" on this peaceful morning. "Oh, yes, I was in the thick of it. He used to grumble tremendously at the length of the programmes. He found it impossible to properly prepare such an amount of work with the too limited time at rehearsal. I remember how distressed he was at the lethargy of the orchestra. He said, with arms uplifted to the band: 'You are the famous Philharmonic orchestra. Raise yourselves, gentlemen; be artists!' He waged war with the Directors for doing such absurd things as putting down an operatic air quite unsuitable to the artistic standard which the Philharmonic Society should follow and to the singer to whom it was assigned. 'Where are the Directors?' he furiously asked at the rehearsal. Wagner said that, outside his immediate circle of friends, there were only two people in England who cared anything about him, and they were the Queen and the Prince Consort."

THE "OCEAN" SYMPHONY AND THE "DIVING BELL."

For fourteen years (1854-1868) Professor Klindworth lived in London as a teacher of the pianoforte and as a concert-giver. He used to teach at a large school at Hendon. His finances were such that he could only afford to ride as far as the "Swiss Cottage," from there he used to walk the intervening three miles and back in the evening—"the pleasantest part of the day's work," he adds—philosophising on the way in such thoughts as "What a fool I am!" He used to teach at the school for eight hours. "When I arrived home in the evening," he says, "I could do nothing but go to sleep, and when I awoke I had a jolly good supper."

In addition to giving various Chamber concerts (at which he and his party, Henry Blagrove and Daubert, introduced many new works and names unknown to English audiences) Herr Klindworth gave (in 1861) three orchestral concerts in London under the title of the "Musical Art Union." At one of these concerts, Gade's "Erl-King's Daughter" was performed for the first time in England. At another, Rubinstein's "Ocean" Symphony, in its original and shorter form, had its initial performance in this country. In this connection Mr. Chorley, the musical critic of the Athenæum, showed his dislike to the methods of the analytical programmist — whom on this "Oceanic" occasion he designated the "diving bell"—in the following terms:—

> In the first part of this "Ocean" Symphony there is much to admire, even for those who are unable to go down in Mr. Macfarren's diving bell to "the treasures buried in the heart of the sea."
> This fashion to present and to ticket thoughts and emotions, which, at best, can only be intimated, and which appeal (when they appeal at all) to twenty different people through as many channels of association, is making wild work of music.

A SIDE-LIGHT—MR. DANNREUTHER.

As in the case of our recent article on Sir Hubert Parry, Mr. Dannreuther has kindly furnished an interesting side-light on Professor Klindworth, a friend of upwards of thirty years' standing.

"Once only I heard Klindworth play in public, when he took part together with the late Walter Bache in the performance of an arrangement for two pianofortes of one of Liszt's Poëmes Symphoniques. In private I have heard him play, week after week, and for years, a good deal of Liszt, Beethoven, and Chopin, and the whole of his own pianoforte scores of Wagner's 'Ring,' from the beginning of 'Das Rheingold' to the end of 'Götterdämmerung.' He not only gave the difficult pianoforte part as it stands without any attempt at simplification and in full tempo, but he sang or declaimed the vocal parts at the same time—truly an astonishing feat. I shall never forget the first act of the 'Walküre,' as he rendered it, when I first called on him one summer afternoon in 1864. Klindworth's name will be remembered as that of the best of Wagner arrangers—'Meine Clavierauszügler'—piano-extractors, as the master used to call them. It is interesting to compare the method and the effect of Klindworth's pianoforte scores of the 'Ring' with Bülow's version of the score of 'Tristan,' Tausig's of the 'Meistersinger,' and Joseph Rubinstein's of 'Parsifal.' Klindworth's version is perhaps even harder to play than any other, but it is more efficient; it reflects the orchestra score as closely as does Liszt's transcription of Weber's overtures, Berlioz's and Beethoven's symphonies and concertos. Liszt's transcriptions are Klindworth's model. I know of no better practice for pianists who are up to Liszt's technique than Klindworth's 'Nibelungen.' Wagner was wont to express great admiration for Bülow's 'Tristan,' which he described as 'the impossible made possible'—still, he declared that the effect at the pianoforte was not always satisfactory—'Die Bässe sind zu jung' ('the basses are too thin'). With Klindworth the player's left hand has exceptionally hard work to do, but the bass stands forth grandly. Tausig's method was too subtle, too pianistic. Tausig confessed that he had not realised Wagner's tempi from the MS. score before him, and that at the true speed his virtuoso contrivances were rather in the way. Much the same thing may be said, and more emphatically, of Joseph Rubinstein's version of the score of 'Parsifal' and the 'Siegfried Idyll,' the first twenty bars of which latter piece are about as clever and as inept as anything of the sort can be."

BERLIOZ IN A REVERIE.

Professor Klindworth relates an amusing anecdote relating to the absent-mindedness of Berlioz as a conductor. At the concert of the now defunct New Philharmonic Society, given in Exeter Hall, on July 4, 1855, and conducted by Berlioz, Professor Klindworth played Henselt's Pianoforte Concerto in F minor. During the progress of the slow movement at the rehearsal, Berlioz fell into a deep reverie, and, apparently forgetting all about the concerto, he stopped conducting. But the soloist and the orchestra went steadily on. At the end of the movement Berlioz was still entranced, and was only aroused when, at a sign from Klindworth, the orchestra began the last movement with an energetic attack of the opening passage! This was the first performance of Henselt's difficult pianoforte concerto in England, and therefore it may not be without interest to quote the opinion of the leading critic of the day, Mr. J. W. Davison, upon the novelty :—

The pianoforte concerto of M. Henselt is the most incoherent thing we ever heard from the pen of that clever composer of bagatelles. It is nothing but an unmeaning pasticcio of traits de bravoure. M. Klindworth has enormous execution, and mastered the octave passages with astonishing rapidity and success. His playing, however, wants charm and repose; and his general style is heavy. He was much applauded at the end; but we do not care if we never hear the concerto again.

MOSCOW. THE CHOPIN EDITION.

After residing fourteen years in England, Professor Klindworth left these shores in 1868 to take up his abode in Moscow. He went at the instigation of Anton Rubinstein as professor of the pianoforte at the Imperial Conservatorium, then under the direction of Nicolas Rubinstein, brother of the great pianist. He made his first appearance in Moscow in Chopin's F minor Concerto, which he had re-orchestrated in a masterly manner before he left London. It was during his sojourn in the old capital of Russia that Professor Klindworth accomplished two remarkable achievements which have given him a European and American reputation. The first is his wonderful pianoforte scores of Wagner's "Der Ring des Nibelungen," already referred to; the second is his monumental edition of Chopin's works, an edition, as Mr. Dannreuther says, "beyond all praise for rare insight into the text and minute care bestowed on the presentation of it." This editorial task, or rather labour of love, occupied Professor Klindworth for three or four years, as he was otherwise much occupied with teaching. Its difficulties were increased by the necessity of collating the editions issued in Paris, London, Brussels, and Leipzig, each having important variants. The edition was issued in 1878 with the following title :—

Fr. Chopin. Oeuvres complètes, revues, doigtées et soigneusement corrigées d'après les éditions de Paris, Londres, Bruxelles et Leipsic par Charles Klindworth.

Klindworth's old fellow student, Hans von Bülow, testified to the excellences of the Chopin edition in the following terms :—

I know of only two ways to learn Chopin's works properly. The first is to hear the great master, Franz Liszt, play them. The second is to study them in Karl Klindworth's edition. Myself a fellow pupil with Klindworth of Liszt, at Weimar, I am fain to consult Klindworth's edition whenever I set about preparing any piece by Chopin for public performance, although I possess Chopin's works in heart and head, and also for the most part at my fingers' ends. I am ready to assert that it is the bounden duty of every conscientious pianist and thoroughly honest pianoforte teacher to do the same. In short, I maintain that Klindworth's is the only masterly edition of Chopin.

Liszt wrote on a presentation copy of one of his own works the following inscription :—

To Karl Klindworth, the very conscientious expert and intelligent annotator of the best edition which has yet appeared of the works of Chopin.

FAREWELL OF MOSCOW. TSCHAÏKOWSKY.

Owing to his fatal illness, Nicolas Rubinstein was prevented from conducting the last concert of the season 1881 of the Imperial Russian Society, at which Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" in its entirety was announced to be performed. Klindworth was therefore requested by him, a few days before the concert, to take the baton, and he had the pleasure of obtaining one of the grandest successes ever witnessed in Moscow. A valuable diamond ring was presented to him by the directors as a mark of their appreciation. Eight years afterwards Tschaïkowsky induced the directors to invite Klindworth to conduct another grand orchestral concert of the Imperial Society in Moscow. On the day fixed for the concert the Empress Augusta of Germany died, and consequently it had to be postponed till New Year's Day. A great failure was therefore generally expected; but, on the contrary, the hall was crowded with the cream of society to greet him who had devoted fourteen years of his life to promote musical culture in Moscow. Enthusiasm was the characteristic feature of this gratifying occasion, and Klindworth received an honorarium of about 130 guineas "for his trouble."

CONDUCTOR AND TEACHER IN BERLIN.

In 1882, after the death of Nicolas Rubinstein, Professor Klindworth returned to the Fatherland, after an absence of nearly thirty years, and settled at Berlin. Here he conducted the Philharmonic concerts conjointly with Dr. Joachim and Wüllner, and for ten years, with unvarying success, all the concerts of the Berlin Wagner Society. The programmes of the latter contained extensive selections from the following works :—

Wagner: "Das Rheingold" and "Parsifal" in their entirety (both first performances in Berlin), the first and third acts of "Die Walküre," the third act of "Die Meistersinger," "Vorspiel" and the third act of "Götterdämmerung," and the "Hymn of the Apostles"; Liszt: "Poëmes Symphoniques," "Dante" and "Faust" symphonies (both twice), Psalm 13, for tenor solo, chorus, and orchestra, and "St. Elizabeth"; Berlioz: "Episode de la vie d'un artiste" and "Retour à la vie" symphonies, all his overtures, and "Faust" (twice); Beethoven: Ninth Symphony (three times) and the great Mass in D; Brahms: "Rinaldo," cantata for tenor solo and chorus, his symphonies, &c., &c.—a striking record of extraordinary attainment.

Professor Klindworth's remarkable ability and energy as a conductor was strongly demonstrated at Mr. Frederick Dawson's concert on May 15. "It was manifest," said the critic of The Musical Times, "that the veteran musician had a fine perception of the subtleties of rhythm and attached great importance to phrasing, and this, combined with a rare faculty of bringing out detail, caused the interpretation of the overture [Wagner's "Faust"] to be singularly clear and impressive."

Professor Klindworth established a Conservatoire of Music in the German capital, which was successfully carried on for twelve years. But since 1893 he has resided at Potsdam. There, amidst most congenial surroundings, and at Berlin he will in future devote himself entirely to private teaching and his editorial work. Pupils flock to him from all parts of the earth, even from such remote regions as Honolulu. It is no wonder that his pupils speak of him in terms of revered appreciation. In relating some of his teaching experiences, he says that, as a rule, those who come to him for "finishing lessons" (so-called) are generally very deficient in rhythmic feeling, "which," he significantly adds, "should be instilled into pupils when they are young." He holds very decided views upon the craving after technical display which is so characteristic of present-day pianists. To those of his pupils whose ambition outruns their discretion in trying, for instance, to conquer the abnormal difficulties of Liszt's pianoforte music, he says: "When I see Blondin walk on the tight-rope from house to house, I think it is very wonderful; but if I attempt to do it, I fall down and I break my neck." He is too great an artist to consider mere technique as the summum bonum of pianoforte playing: his great aim, both by precept and practice, is to instil into the minds of his pupils an ideally poetical feeling in interpreting the music they study under his watchful supervision.

Amongst his original compositions for the pianoforte Professor Klindworth has published a very difficult and effective "Polonaise-fantasie." His arrangements of Schubert's great C major Symphony for two pianofortes and his four-hand and solo arrangements of Tschaïkowsky's "Poëme symphonique: Francesca da Rimini" deserve high commendation. In addition to the re-scoring of Chopin's F minor Concerto, already referred to, he has made a condensation of and orchestrated C. V. Alkan's Concerto in G sharp minor (Etudes, Op. 39), both of which remain in manuscript. Within recent years he has edited Bach's "Forty-eight Preludes and Fugues" and "English Suites," some of Schumann's pianoforte works, and all Beethoven's pianoforte sonatas. Also "24 grosse Etüden," being a selection he has made from Clementi's "Gradus ad Parnassum," and some of the more useful and difficult of Bertini's studies. Bach's Two and Three-part Inventions are in course of publication.

HIS LATEST EDITORIAL WORK.

Mendelssohn's "Songs without Words"—the complete edition of eight books—have just received the benefit of Professor Klindworth's editorial supervision. The work is now in the press and will shortly be published by Messrs. Novello. A perusal of the proof sheets not only reveals that critical insight and characteristic acumen which one naturally looks for in his work, but every page gives evidence of his wide experience as a teacher and complete knowledge of the art of pianoforte playing. Phrasing and fingering have received minute attention, and the preface helps to demonstrate the thoroughness with which the Professor has discharged his task. It will cause no surprise if, as in the case of the works of Chopin, the Klindworth edition will become the edition of Mendelssohn's "Songs without Words."

LOVE OF ENGLAND.

"Six weeks of a most happy time, one of the most enjoyable I have had in my life. I shall always think of you all with deep gratitude, and the remembrance of it will always remain a source of great pleasure to me." Thus wrote the Professor to the present writer immediately after the conclusion of his recent visit to London. "I shall perhaps come back again in the autumn to conduct a Symphony concert of my own, and another concert for Frederick Dawson," he remarked in the course of conversation. "If I were only a 'capitalist' I would build a cottage at Hampstead Heath, where I could live very happily."

A RECITAL BEFORE AN AUDIENCE OF ONE.

Professor Klindworth did not play in public during his sojourn in London in the leafy month of June. But he gave a "strictly private" pianoforte recital (by invitation) on the day that he left. The hour was the unconventional one of 8 a.m.: the only listener was the writer of this biographical sketch. Pieces by Liszt, Chopin, and Beethoven were played as only a great artist can play them. Vigour, refinement, accentuation, technical facility, self-effacement, and, above all, true musicianship were combined, as they rarely are in the same individual, with ideal results.

There was a felicitous appropriateness in the Professor's choice of Beethoven's sonata "Les Adieux, l'Absence, et le Retour." As the strains of each successive movement were deftly performed by that master hand, there came over the one-man audience the feeling that the regrets attending the approaching "good-bye" might be tempered by a short "absence" and a speedy "return" of so eminent a teacher and so distinguished a musician as Karl Klindworth.

SOME RECOLLECTIONS.

II.

My First Eisteddfod.

Before these lines appear I shall again have acted as an adjudicator at a meeting of the Welsh National Eisteddfod. For a Saxon, I have been much concerned with that peculiarly Celtic institution; but my first experience of it was due to one of the sudden and unexpected occurrences which seem, more or less, to make sport of us all.

The Birmingham Festival of 1867 had just ended, and J. W. Davison and myself were dining together in the coffee room of the Queen's Hotel when our waiter handed a telegram to the potent critic of The Times. My old friend (he was, comparatively speaking, my new friend then) did not love telegrams. They were associated in his mind with abrupt changes in his plans—rude interferences with designs upon which he had set his heart, and I knew that he contemplated an immediate holiday at Malvern, which, as a local scribbler once said, was his "fond place." "J. W. D." dashed the buff-coloured envelope on the table, and an angry light shone in the eyes which just before had sparkled with merriment. As he showed no curiosity with regard to the purport of the telegram, I suggested that he should open it. "Time enough for bad news," was the dour reply. I said no more. But Davison's moods were exactly like those of April, and when the sun shone again, as it did in a few minutes, the envelope was torn open and the message read. Davison flung it over to me with a strong expletive. It was from Delane, and suggested that something interesting might be got out of an Eisteddfod to be holden at Carmarthen during the following week. A suggestion from the great editor was, of course, a command, and there was nothing for it but to obey. I pass over my friend's immediate observations. He had seen enough of Eisteddfodau! It was all adjectived nonsense! The Welsh never took criticism in good part, and should be left to their own devices! These were some of the remarks that came later. In addition, he urged that he could not go alone into the distant region of Carmarthenshire. I knew quite well what this plea would lead up to, and was prepared for his "Come with me, there's a good fellow, do!" "But, J. W., who will take my services on Sunday? I must be in London to-morrow at latest." "Stuff and nonsense! Wire to the fellow who devils for you, and also to the parson." In the end I gave way; the messages were despatched, and the next morning saw us start for our new scene of operations. Let me state, in parenthesis, that the expression "scene of operations" applied to me in scanty measure only. At that time I wrote mainly for the Sunday Times, sending an occasional article to the Musical Standard, and an irregular communication of a flippant character to the Musical World. I travelled therefore with a light heart, save for a qualm or two caused by London duty neglected. It was otherwise with Davison, especially while the Malvern Hills remained in sight. He, unlike myself, was in the direct path of duty, but his heart was sad and heavy. Happily, on reaching Gloucester, he met with Lewis Thomas and John Thomas, who were also bound to the Eisteddfod, under engagement. Now Davison had butts for the shafts of his wit, and a company to do the laughing. During the remainder of the journey he was busily engaged and quite happy. This was my first meeting with the artists whose names I have mentioned; one of whom remained to the end of his life among my most intimate and honoured friends. Of the other, who happily is still living, I have no recollections save those arising from most pleasant association.

Behold the four of us descend at a very comfortable hotel, still existing, still known far and wide, but the name of which has escaped me. The quaint old town, decorated for festivity, and especially the vast wooden building, officially styled "Pavilion," which had been set up for the ceremonies of the week, greatly interested me. The pavilion, as I had good reason to remember, stood in a meadow, some forty or fifty yards from the gate. It was very gay within. The Dragon of Wales ramped heraldically about the place; there were flags galore, and mottoes in Welsh, whereof I could not understand a word; on which account, perhaps, I took the greater interest in them. The proceedings did not begin till Tuesday, and by that time London artists were very well represented in the town. Edith Wynne, Janet Whytock (Patey), Lazarus (the clarinettist), Annie Edmonds, and Brinley Richards, as well as Lewis Thomas and John Thomas, helped to make up a goodly array of executants, to hear whom, we fancied, the surrounding population would flock like doves to their windows.

I must not forget to state that the musical arrangements of the week had been entrusted to Brinley Richards (a native of Carmarthen), the committee, as he told us, good, simple soul! having "approached" him to that end. Richards undertook the duty, resolved that his countrymen should enjoy the advantage of excellent artists and high-class music. As will be seen, the popular voice did not thank him.

Tuesday morning come, Davison and I made our way to the pavilion through streets which were neither crowded nor excited. A hollow-sounding wind was blowing from the Atlantic, and small, ragged clouds scudded before it, like fishing boats running for harbour, what time a storm threatens. "I don't like that wind," said my companion. I answered nothing, for what did the wind matter? Then J. W. tried again. "You take my word that the chairman this morning will throw himself at the English press for all he is worth." "Why?" "Oh, these Welshmen fancy that we make fun of them." "Well, it seems to me that they are not far wrong." "What do you know about it? Wait till this meeting is over." I was content to wait. By this time we had entered the pavilion, where, from a platform occupied by men wearing artificial leeks and other insignia, an elderly gentleman addressed an audience which seemed lost in the vast empty spaces of the structure. His name, I think, was Johnes—a form of spelling Jones that stands to the original as Smythe does to Smith. He was an excellent person, I afterwards learned, and of some literary repute. But culture did not deter him from "going for" the London journals, The Times more particularly. In fact, the name of the then "Thunderer" was the first word we heard after taking our seats. "Told you so," said Davison, and addressed himself, with a perfectly innocent expression of countenance, to take in the orator's words. My own expression must have been one of astonishment. I had no idea that London papers, especially the solemn and important Times, could be so wicked as worthy Mr. Johnes asserted they were, nor had I the least idea that the friend next to me owned no more conscience than Mephistopheles, that he went about jesting at what he failed to understand, making wilful misrepresentations, and treating with ribaldry national and ancient customs which every man of right feeling would consider with respect. I see Davison now, as he listened, sitting well forward, with both hands on his stick, his blue-grey eyes twinkling with suppressed mirth, but his face otherwise cast in a mould of respectful, even sympathetic attention. He was personally known to nobody there, and took very good care that nothing in his demeanour should excite suspicion. As the speaker went on I whispered, "Does he mean what he says?" "Not he," replied Davison, "'tis a part of the annual programme; the people expect it." Anyhow they seemed to enjoy it.

All this is now, I am glad to say, a thing of the past. Englishman and Welshman understand each other, in relation to the Eisteddfod, much better than they did thirty years ago. Celtic traditions and observances are treated with respect by Saxon journals, and it is not at all an uncommon thing to see English gentlemen acting as Eisteddfod chairmen. Let us be thankful for every wall of separation broken down.

My first Eisteddfod is memorable to me on two accounts. In the first place, because the rain-god played a part at it. The pluvial deity came "flying all abroad" on the wings of the Atlantic wind, and settled down at Carmarthen ere the Eisteddfod was two days old. He came to stay. Of course, every dweller in this moist Isle of Britain knows what an abundance of rain means, but I trust that few have had experience of such a deadly-persistent downfall as that which almost literally overwhelmed the Carmarthen Eisteddfod. It was not only continuous, but copious and wind-lashed; pouring down till the streets were streams, and the meadows became even as marshes. Alas for the approach to the pavilion through the lake of mud into which the field had been turned! In the case of those who wished to keep dry feet and a decent appearance it was possible to reach the entrance only by means of a carriage. At one visit, every fly and cab being engaged, I chartered the hotel omnibus for the behoof of my solitary self. In vain the authorities laid down straw. It was soon swallowed up in the quagmire, and all the time the rain descended and the floods came. Within the pavilion some strange experiences awaited those who braved the elements, and thought, perhaps, that the worst was over when they found a roof above their heads. But that Carmarthen rain laughed at the constructors of wooden roofs as Love laughs at locksmiths, and for the same reason—it could not be kept out. What did we see on one particularly damp evening? We saw the audience obtaining such enjoyment as they could under umbrellas. We saw poor Lazarus playing a clarinet solo, also under an umbrella, which a kind friend held patiently over him. We saw the pianoforte chased about the platform by raindrops—these, as the instrument was moved from a wet place to a dry, speedily beginning to descend straight upon it. A doggerel and despairing bard of the period sang:

"The rain, it raineth every day,
And the wind is never weary":
Ah, me! that poet did not know
How, at Carmarthen, winds can blow,
How wet the rain and dreary.

Quite true; he didn't.

In the second place, I hold this Eisteddfod memorable for a revolt of the proletariat against the higher powers. I had not been long in the town before learning that the engagement of English artists and the provision of so much music other than Welsh had caused great dissatisfaction. The working folk preferred Welsh singers and Welsh songs—so much preferred them that they declared open war. Hostilities began mildly with shouts of "Gymraeg!" when a platform speaker addressed them in English. Of that no particular notice was taken; the demonstration being neither unusual nor unnatural. But, to the immense confusion of Brinley Richards, who, poor man, meant well, the people soon turned their arms against the alien music and musicians. They made, however, an oblique attack, opportunity for which came about in this wise: Among the visitors to the Eisteddfod was a baritone vocalist of some repute along the countryside, popularly known by his bardic designation, Llew Llwyfo. This gentleman is still living, I understand, and the name of Llew Llwyfo appeared in the programme of the recent Eisteddfod at Blaenau Festiniog. Thirty years ago he had a good voice and sang with spirit and intelligence, if not in the most refined style. However that may have been, the people turned Llew Llwyfo's presence to account in a somewhat clever manner. They did not assail the English artists and the alien music in a direct fashion, but expressed preference for native singers and their own national songs by shouting "Llew" in season and out of season. Llew they would have. They were ready to give attention to others if Llew had his turn, not else. Poor, confused Richards was appalled at the mistake he had made, and went about pleading that the committee "approached" him with a desire for high-class concerts, and he had provided them. The immediate question, however, was how to deal with the popular revolt. At first it was ignored, in hope that the public voice would become weary. But shouts for Llew were as persistent as the beating of the rain on the leaky roof. What could a poor, distracted committee do save bend before the storm, and invite Llew Llwyfo to come on the platform. The favourite was nothing loth; while his partisans, seeing in their victory a triumph of nationality, cheered and cheered with frantic enthusiasm. Llew appeared several times during the remainder of the Eisteddfod, always amid flattering demonstrations, nor were his admirers offended when he put in an English ditty, singing Hatton's "Simon the Cellarer" with good effect. The matter did not end with the close of the meetings. It broke out afresh in the newspapers, provoked mainly by Davison. That experienced journalist saw an opportunity for some enlivening remarks in the battle for Llew, whose bardic name he preferred to render in English as "the Roaring Lion." Davison knew well enough that his interpretation was not correct, but it served to aggravate the foe, in common with sportive criticisms conceived in the same vein. Answering The Times, all sorts and conditions of men took up the fight, some writing to the great paper itself, others flooding the columns of the local sheets; everyone taking seriously, and discussing indignantly, observations written in purest playfulness. All the sense of humour in and about Carmarthen seemed to have been washed away by the rains. Davison, who enjoyed the fracas immensely, remained in the town through it all, and there (some spoke of Nemesis) he caught a chill, the consequences of which detained him, either there or at Tenby, for many weary months. I cannot remember that he ever again had to do with an Eisteddfod.

I have said that Llew Llwyfo still lives, but how many of the little band of artists and journalists who were present through the scenes above described have entered the Silent Land! Edith Wynne, Janet Patey, Lewis Thomas, J. W. Davison, Henry Lazarus, Brinley Richards—all these old comrades and friends have departed; surviving only in such memories as those I have just told.

A MAD CRITIC.

Kind reader—or otherwise—I am mad. My mission in life is to give people opinions about musical art which they may pass off as their own. To this end I have in the past season attended six hundred concerts, witnessed seven impressive comic operas, been present at two choral funerals, heard ten performances of Tschaïkowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony, and sat out two entire cycles of the "Nibelung's Ring." Can you wonder I am mad? But there is method in my madness, and although my impressions are, perhaps, a little mixed, they are very vivid, and at this retrospective season of the year cannot fail to be valuable to posterity, wherefore it is my duty to record them.

The event of the year has been Wagner's cycle. There was no getting away from it. It chased you wherever you went and ran you down in every street. Theme hunting has been the craze of the drawing-room and the study, for we have the authority of the Daily Telegraph that it is but weariness of the flesh to attend a performance of the "Ring" unless you have memorized the themes. In other words, the fleshly weariness should be undergone at home. All this, however, will be avoided by use of my patent theme finder. This little instrument is based on the principle of the phonograph. The bell is directed towards the orchestra, and as soon as any theme is given out it causes a little flap to fly up, on which is inscribed the name of the theme. A small electric light is also provided for the dark scenes, and by use of this brain-saving little contrivance you can listen intelligently to Wagner without thinking; an ideal consummation. The intermediate cycle began before the second cycle, but finished after it, and yet was not longer than the others. I understand this occasioned some confusion in the minds of those of weak intellect. Mr. George Grossmith was very fine as Wotan, and excited great enthusiasm by his interpolation in the second act of "Die Walküre" of "See me dance the polka," at the place where Wotan relates his early adventures.

In regard to this useful and admirably compiled index, the editor says: "Much of the matter herein found is absolutely new, and obtained at first hand from the composers themselves. Much, again, is the result of long-continued research on the part of the editor, while, in not a few instances, valuable information has been communicated by gentlemen specially interested in the history of tunes." Where did the Rev. Dr. J. B. Dykes's tune, "Lux Benigna" (to "Lead, kindly Light"), make its first appearance? Mr. Griffiths gives the reference as "Psalms and Hymns [for Divine Worship], 1867." But the tune did not find a place in that collection. It was written, according to the recently issued "Life" of its composer, in August, 1865.

The site in the Churchyard of St. Sebastian, Salzburg, where the remains of Leopold Mozart, the father of the immortal Wolfgang, were laid at rest, has been for many years past extremely problematical, the stone slab indicating its exact whereabouts having, for some unaccountable reason, disappeared. Thanks to the untiring exertions of Herr Johann E. Engel, the well-known Mozart enthusiast, it has recently been ascertained, both by documentary evidence and by subsequent excavations, that Leopold Mozart's grave is identical with that in which, years after, Wolfgang's widow had caused her second husband, Staatsrath Nissen, to be buried, and a monument to be erected to his memory. Moreover, a third historically interesting personage, the mother of Carl Maria von Weber, who died in her thirty-first year, and who was related to the Mozart family, had found a resting-place in the same grave. These facts having been verified beyond all question, a marble tablet with the three names inscribed thereon was placed at the base of the Nissen monument, on the 9th ult., with due ceremony, under the auspices of the Mozarteum Society of Salzburg. Would that Herr Engel's researches could lead him to render to music-lovers the wide world over a similar service in the case of Leopold Mozart's illustrious son!

The "Troubadour" bicycle, which an ingenious Berlin manufacturer has just patented, may be said to mark a new development of the "forward movement" in musical art. The same day Herr van Rooy gave a humorous recital at St. James's Hall, and Herr Mottl gave a magnificent reading of the part of the Prophet in "Elijah" at the Alexandra Palace. Dr. Joachim's embodiment of the part of Siegfried was lacking in youthful exuberance, but he imitated the "Bird's Song" very effectively on a violin which he made out of a few stage reeds. The following day M. Jean de Reszke reproduced this incident at his recital with Mr. Leonard Borwick of five of Beethoven's symphonies, which had been specially arranged by M. Korderowski for violin and flute. Mr. E. F. Jacques's analytical programme on this occasion was very edifying. M. Paderewski had been specially engaged for the part of Loge in "Das Rheingold" on account of his hair, which gave a remarkably realistic effect to the character. Earlier in the season M. Paderewski's appearance in the title-rôle of "Orfeo" must be regarded as the crowning triumph of the Covent Garden Syndicate, for no one could doubt that his pianoforte playing would secure his passing safely through Hades into the well-wooded pastures of the Elysian fields, whereas the efficiency of the lyre hitherto seen has always been open to question. His descent was very cleverly managed. Three stage managers from Bayreuth had been engaged to bring the apparatus used in the first scene of "Das Rheingold," and it was a beautiful sight to behold Paderewski and his resonator floating in space, while scales and arpeggios streamed forth in all directions. There were many other embodiments that will long be remembered. Sir Henry Irving sang exquisitely as Romeo. Miss Ellen Terry as Brünnhilde was one of the surprises of the season, and Miss Marie Brema on one occasion nearly cleared the stage by her dauntless horsemanship on a bare backed steed who possessed a singularly wild eye. It may not be generally known that the one aim of the Royal Opera Syndicate has been educational. For this purpose Madame Melba was engaged to instruct the audience how to sing scales; Madame Eames to show the effects of emotion controlled by a constant desire to be graceful; Madame Calvé to teach the art of fascination; Fräulein Ternina to inculcate appropriate expression; Miss Adams to encourage youth; and M. Saléza to expose the evils of exaggeration. The most successful artist of the season at Covent Garden was Mr. Neil Forsyth, who in his thought reading interviews displayed an acuteness that was marvellous. Having gained possession of Wagner's original tarnhelm, his sudden disappearances were no less wonderful than the celerity with which he appeared when wanted, restored diamond brooches to disconsolate ladies, and found wandering stalls and private boxes. He performed every night. I fear this article is not quite as clear or comprehensive as it should have been, but it is useless my mentioning what my readers remember, and they would be sure not to forget anything they wish to recollect, and therefore I may say logically that my chronicle of the season is complete.

FROM MY STUDY.

A very entertaining book for holiday reading is one which bears the fantastic title "Snazelleparilla," and is published by Messrs. Chatto and Windus. It cannot be difficult to make out from the name of the volume that Mr. Snazelle, the musical comedian, has had something to do with it. In point of fact, that artist's adventures and observations form the "Snazelleparilla," which Mr. G. S. Edwards has decanted for our use, or, in other words, put into literary shape. There are many illustrations from the pencil of Snazelle's old friend, Charles Lyall, who has entered into the fun of the thing with the zest to be expected in the case of an acknowledged master of pictorial humour. Mr. Snazelle, through Mr. Edwards, bien entendu, gives a sketch of his early life, from which it appears that he began by figuring as something, not much, in the City; next appearing in the character of a commercial traveller, his line being side-spring boots. "My elastics," says our author, "brought me not a single order, but involved me in thirteen fights—chiefly with blustering boot-makers in the neighbourhood of the Tottenham Court Road." Snazelle next played the part of a bank clerk, and while acting in that respectable capacity there came to him an opportunity of trying his luck as a singer in connection with Messrs. Gatti's promenade concerts at Covent Garden Theatre. Mr. Snazelle is modestly silent as to the result, but he must have made some sort of a reputation, not necessarily a public one, before the manager of the Gaiety Theatre, Glasgow, invited him to play Mephistopheles in place of Signor Rota, indisposed. This being his first appearance on the stage, his ignorance of traps and other contrivances for producing supernatural effects is not wonderful. But ignorance was not bliss, for after making the Tempter's hirsute adornments secure with an explosive spirit gum, the lycopodium flash, as the trap shot up, set fire to those appendages, and the entrance of Mephistopheles was loudly applauded as a novel variation upon usage. "But," says Mr. Snazelle, "the wonder to me unto this day is that I was not roasted alive coram publico." The company with which he made such a sensational début stranded in Dublin, where the prima donna was seen getting her dinner at a whelk and cockle stall, while the conductor drank the liquor that was left in the saucers. After losing £17,000 of his bank's money in the course of a "walk," and finding it again just where he had left it, Snazelle came to the conclusion that nature had not intended him to be a clerk. Upon this, he accepted an engagement offered him by Carl Rosa, and spent nine years in that manager's service, appearing also in Italian opera at Her Majesty's Theatre during the off season of his regular company. It was at the Haymarket house that Snazelle undertook the part of Sparafucile ("Rigoletto"), and had to dodge the low F with which that personage makes his exit. The artist did not possess the note, but a violoncellist in the orchestra did, and, for half-a-guinea, consented to supply it at the right moment. In the result, "a thundering low F rang through the house while Sparafucile's back was turned to the audience. Terrific applause!"

Leaving the Carl Rosa Company, Snazelle worked out an entertainment, "Music, Song, and Story," with pictorial—that is to say, magic lantern illustrations. With this show our adventurer knocked about the world, taking it to Australia, New Zealand, the South Sea Islands, America, and where not else. In the course of these peregrinations he picked up, or found the material for, many stories, which are here displayed in abundance. Very good stories they are for the most part, so that we do not care to question the manner in which they are, so to speak, pulled in by the ears. It would not be fair to take these out of their setting, but I must be permitted to copy the table of receipts at a Snazelle entertainment in the Fiji Islands. Here it is:—

Four sucking pigs.
Eight hundred cocoa-nuts.
One thousand of a common class of moonstone collected on the beach.
Forty pearls, both black and white, but of course very small.
Twenty-three model canoes.
Two hundred yards of tappa—native cloth, beaten out of the bark of a tree.
Forty-two Fiji costumes—they didn't take up much room.
Three whale's teeth.
Hundreds of sharks' teeth.
One or two cart-loads of beautiful coral.
War implements—spears, knobsticks, clubs, knives.
Native mats and pillows.
Seven grog bowls.

In addition, a pair of whale's jaws were promised. They weighed nearly two tons, and were on the beach of the Isle of Tonga, nearly 300 miles away.

Here I leave Mr. Snazelle's book, which is one to take on holiday, as a precaution against a wet spell and confinement to sea-side lodgings.

With reference to Mr. King Holtham's suggested phrasing of passages in Mendelssohn's organ sonatas, Mr. Herbert Rowledge writes from Peterboro' as below: "Mendelssohn slipshod! A laboured refutation of the charge is hardly necessary, but, as you invite expressions of opinion as to Mr. King Holtham's suggested phrasing of themes from the organ sonatas, I may, perhaps, be permitted to point out that there is no reason to suppose that Mendelssohn was not as capable of expressing his ideas in musical notation as—well, as anybody else; and as he did not write what Mr. Holtham has written, I suppose he did not mean to do so. The slurs, I think, obviously indicate simply a legato style. I am afraid Mendelssohn would scarcely have regarded with complacency the chopping up of his beautiful legato fugue themes into spasmodic fragments strongly suggestive of a defective wind supply."

I see that Messrs. Haynes and Co., of Gray's Inn Road, are issuing a series of cheap handbooks under the general title of "The Violinist's Book-shelf." The second number of the series is thus designated: "The Art of Fiddle Making, a Practical Guide for Practical Men," and its author is Mr. John Broadhouse, one of the secretaries of the Guild of Violinists. Mr. Broadhouse states in his brief preface: "With the help of this little book, a man of fair intelligence and some aptitude in the use of tools will be able to construct a violin. Whether it will be a good or a bad violin will depend mainly upon things which will come gradually, and after some failures and many attempts, within the maker's own control. There is no magic in the art of making a fiddle, but there is a wide scope for the exercise of the mental powers of him who would make a good instrument." This little book is simply what it pretends to be—a practical guide, and if the young fiddle maker goes wrong it can hardly be the fault of Mr. Broadhouse. On one point, however, the author does not attempt to counsel his reader. He cannot teach him how to choose his wood. A piece of very emphatic advice is—let your tools be the best that money can buy. "Bad tools are a constant source of annoyance. Some of your tools will be such as are used by all who work in wood; others are specially made for violin makers." What those tools should be is set forth in the plainest language by our author, who then takes his pupil through the delicate yet fascinating task of constructing a fiddle, first, however, pointing out that some famous model should be chosen. Patterns of Amati, Stradivarius, and other violins can be obtained for a few pence from Messrs. Haynes and Co. Every man his own fiddle maker—does that lie in the future? Hardly; because every man is not apt with tools; but he who has some skill in craftsmanship need not despair of making a decent violin. Many years ago I knew two village carpenters who spent their leisure time in manufacturing violins, violas, and violoncelli, for which there was always some demand, those instruments being then largely used in churches and chapels. Very decent specimens they were, and a particularly fine viola was long in my possession. These makers had no Mr. Broadhouse to advise them.

Sir Hubert Parry has received many congratulations on the honour recently conferred on him by Her Majesty. None can have given him greater pleasure than the spontaneous outburst of affection which greeted him on the afternoon of Friday, the 22nd ult., in the concert hall of the Royal College of Music, whither he had been invited to meet a large gathering of past and present pupils of the College, and to receive from them, in the shape of a handsome silver loving cup, a token of the feelings of profound admiration and esteem with which he is regarded by those to whose interests he devotes the best of his energies.

Those taking an active part in the proceedings were Mr. Howard Jones (an Associate of the College), the hon. sec. of a small committee, representing subscribers to the number of about 700, all of them now, or formerly, pupils of the College; Mr. R. Vaughan Williams, who, in a few well-chosen sentences, expressed the desire of the donors to supplement the recent public recognition of the Director's services with a private and personal expression of their admiration for, and gratitude to the man who had taught them what music is, and begged his acceptance of a present, which the speaker described as "not very costly, but very representative"; and Mr. W. Read, the present leader of the College orchestra, by whom the cup was then formally handed to Sir Hubert. The reception which the Director met with on rising to speak was so eloquent an expression of the feelings of the meeting, that he might well feel his voice falter a moment in commencing his genial speech of thanks, in which the chief reference to himself was that he was fortunate beyond his deserts in the affection of those he saw around him.

Among many old friends present was Sir George Grove, and the burst of applause which greeted an affectionate reference to him in the Director's address must have assured him of the honour in which his name is still held in the College for which he did so much. The cup itself is plain, handsome, and of good model; its value is tenfold enhanced to the recipient by the spontaneity of the gift, the motives which prompted it, and the graceful simplicity with which it was offered.

Sir Martin le Marchant Hadsley Gosselin, K.C.M.G., who has just been appointed an Additional Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, was an old schoolfellow of Sir Hubert Parry's at Eton. In the biographical sketch of the Director of the Royal College of Music which appeared in our last issue, we incidentally referred to Sir Martin Gosselin as one of four musical boys who were at Eton together, he ("Marchy," as he was called) being distinguished as a pianoforte player. The Eton College Chronicle, in recording the College concerts during the sixties, contains such references as: "It is needless to say that Mr. Gosselin, by his pianoforte solo (Weber), met with enthusiastic applause, and, being encored, he played the well-known 'Harmonious Blacksmiths' [sic] with his usual masterly execution." Again: "His playing was quite marvellous, and excited the audience to such a pitch that the noise of applause was quite deafening." May Sir Martin Gosselin experience a repetition of his Etonian successes in the part he may have to play in the Concert of Europe.

Mr. Robert Newman announces "The First London Musical Festival, 1899," which is to be held at Queen's Hall from Monday, May 8, to Saturday, May 13, 1899, inclusive. Except on Saturday, two performances will take place daily, at 3 and 8.30 p.m. Two orchestras will take part, the Queen's Hall Orchestra of 103 performers, under the direction of Mr. Henry J. Wood, and the Lamoureux Parisian Orchestra of 100 performers, conducted by Mons. Charles Lamoureux, together with eminent vocal and instrumental performers. While cordially commending Mr. Newman's enterprise, we should like to point out that the title, "The First London Musical Festival," is scarcely justified by the facts. Apart from the Handel Commemoration (five days) in 1784, at Westminster Abbey and the Pantheon, the Amateur Musical Festival (three days) in 1834, and the Grand Festival (also three days) in 1836, both held in Exeter Hall, the late Henry Leslie gave three performances in the Albert Hall, under the title "The London Musical Festival," on June 14, 18, and 21, 1873. Within more recent recollection there have been the Bach Choir Festivals, which must also be taken into account. "What's in a name?" Mr. Newman will probably ask. We reply by wishing him all success in his "First" festival. May it not be his last.

Thomas Attwood's devotional anthem—or, as he modestly called it, hymn—"Come, Holy Ghost," is so well known that anything concerning its history is naturally interesting. The following incident was related by the late Mr. J. G. Boardman (whose death we record in another column) to Mr. John S. Bumpus. In the year 1833 Mr. Boardman was a chorister of St. Paul's Cathedral, having as a colleague John Hopkins, now organist of Rochester Cathedral. At that time the St. Paul's boys, like the ten children of the Chapel Royal, resided under the roof of the cane-loving Mr. William Hawes; but they were allowed to sleep at their own homes on Saturday nights. Attwood lived at a villa on Beulah Hill, Upper Norwood. An ordination was to be held at St. Paul's on Trinity Sunday, 1833. On the preceding day the Bishop of London (Blomfield) requested Attwood to set the "Veni, Creator" to music specially for the solemn occasion, which he did. It was Attwood's custom on Sunday mornings to drive from Norwood to St. Paul's in a gig drawn by Peggy, a steady-going pony. His route included the Brixton Road, where, at Union Cottage, Cranmer Road, North Brixton, resided Master J. G. Boardman. Attwood was kind-heartedness itself, and it was the custom for young Boardman to be on the look out for a "lift" in the old organist's gig. On this particular occasion (Trinity Sunday, 1833), the gig appeared in sight with its occupant busily engaged in writing, the reins being thrown over the back of Peggy, who knew her way to St. Paul's quite as well as her master. It turned out that Attwood was putting the finishing touches to the vocal parts of his anthem "Come, Holy Ghost," for it was his invariable custom to write these parts out with his own hand whenever his compositions were sung at St. Paul's or at the Chapel Royal. Placing the completed treble solo in Johnny Boardman's hands, Attwood said that he wished him to sing it at that very morning's service. The young chorister duly obeyed, and, without previous rehearsal, sang the solo to the complete satisfaction of both the composer and the Bishop. Shortly after, the anthem was published by J. Alfred Novello, with the following title:—

Come, Holy Ghost, a Hymn for four voices, with an accompaniment for the organ or pianoforte, composed by Thomas Attwood, Organist of St. Paul's Cathedral.

London: Published (for the composer) by Jos. Alfred Novello, 69, Dean Street, Soho Square, where may be had The Sanctus and Responses in G and the Coronation Anthem in D, by the same composer.

English music is making its way into unexpected quarters. From Toulouse (noted for its liver and truffle pies) comes the news that the following compositions, amongst others by the sons of "Rule Britannia," have recently been performed at the "Café de la Paix":—"Danses Anglaises. (a) Stately, (b) Graceful . . Cowen," and "Marjorie Gavotte . . John E. West." The opportunity to record this gratifying intelligence from Toulouse is too good to lose.

Hearty congratulations to Mr. Henry J. Wood, conductor of the Queen's Hall concerts, on the occasion of his marriage (on the 20th ult.), to Olga, only daughter of the late Princess Sofie Ourousoff, of Emilovka, Podolia. "Now we know," the sapiently disposed will say, "the reason why Mr. Wood has paid such marked attention to Russian music. The Leitmotiv will be found—whether you like it (the music) or not—in 'As you like it,' Act v., Scene 3: 'It was a lover and——.'" Alas

A few important changes have been made in the programme of the approaching Gloucester Festival. The Adagio and Finale ("Il Pensieroso") from Professor Stanford's Symphony, No. 5, in D (Op. 56) will be included, and at the secular concert in the Shire Hall the orchestra will play a new Ballade in A minor specially composed for the festival by Mr. Coleridge-Taylor. Only two, instead of three, parts of Handel's "Judas Maccabæus" will be given, thus making way for Mozart's G minor Symphony, which will be welcomed. The title of Sir Hubert Parry's new work is "A Song of Darkness and Light." It is for one soloist (soprano), band, and chorus, and will occupy about forty minutes in performance. The band will number seventy-three performers, and it is said to be the largest and the best ever engaged for the Three Choir Festivals.

Those of our readers who may be taking their holiday within reach of Dresden during the last week of this month, or in September, may find the following information (kindly supplied to us by a correspondent in Germany) useful:—

Dates of the performances of Wagner's operas in Dresden: August 24, "Rienzi"; 27, "Der fliegende Holländer"; 30, "Tannhäuser"; September 2, "Lohengrin"; 6, "Die Meistersinger"; 8, "Tristan und Isolde"; 13, "Rheingold"; 14, "Die Walküre"; 16, "Siegfried"; 20, "Götterdämmerung." On the intermediate evenings will be given: Gluck's "Iphigenie in Aulis" and "Iphigenie in Tauris"; Beethoven's "Fidelio"; Mozart's "Don Juan"; Méhul's "Joseph in Egypten"; Berlioz's "Benvenuto Cellini"; Verdi's "Amelia"—i.e., "Ballo in Maschera"; Rossini's "Barber of Seville." The prices will be as usual—i.e., from 7 Marks to 1 Mark, according to the position of the seats.

A fresh proof of the attention now bestowed upon worship-music by Nonconformists is afforded in the recent issue of the "Bible Christian Sunday School Hymnal" (26, Paternoster Row, or Novello and Company, Limited). This hymnal, containing upwards of 500 tunes, on the commendable fixed-tune system, has been edited by Mr. J. R. Griffiths with conspicuous success, the editor having discharged his responsible duty with sound judgment combined with a full knowledge of practical requirements. A very unusual feature, but one of general interest in such books, is to be found in the "Alphabetical index of tunes," which contains the earliest known "first appearances" of the tunes therein gathered together. In regard to this useful and admirably compiled index, the editor says: "Much of the matter herein found is absolutely new, and obtained at first hand from the composers themselves. Much, again, is the result of long-continued research on the part of the editor, while, in not a few instances, valuable information has been communicated by gentlemen specially interested in the history of tunes." Where did the Rev. Dr. J. B. Dykes's tune, "Lux Benigna" (to "Lead, kindly Light"), make its first appearance? Mr. Griffiths gives the reference as "Psalms and Hymns [for Divine Worship], 1867." But the tune did not find a place in that collection. It was written, according to the recently issued "Life" of its composer, in August, 1865.

The site in the Churchyard of St. Sebastian, Salzburg, where the remains of Leopold Mozart, the father of the immortal Wolfgang, were laid at rest, has been for many years past extremely problematical, the stone slab indicating its exact whereabouts having, for some unaccountable reason, disappeared. Thanks to the untiring exertions of Herr Johann E. Engel, the well-known Mozart enthusiast, it has recently been ascertained, both by documentary evidence and by subsequent excavations, that Leopold Mozart's grave is identical with that in which, years after, Wolfgang's widow had caused her second husband, Staatsrath Nissen, to be buried, and a monument to be erected to his memory. Moreover, a third historically interesting personage, the mother of Carl Maria von Weber, who died in her thirty-first year, and who was related to the Mozart family, had found a resting-place in the same grave. These facts having been verified beyond all question, a marble tablet with the three names inscribed thereon was placed at the base of the Nissen monument, on the 9th ult., with due ceremony, under the auspices of the Mozarteum Society of Salzburg. Would that Herr Engel's researches could lead him to render to music-lovers the wide world over a similar service in the case of Leopold Mozart's illustrious son!

The "Troubadour" bicycle, which an ingenious Berlin manufacturer has just patented, may be said to mark a new development of the "forward movement" in musical art. This interesting "machine," we understand, will, when in motion, perform a number of popular airs by means of a mechanical contrivance attached to it, and delight the audience along the road by the delivery of some more or less appreciable fragments, according to the speed adopted by the rider. A number of these musical cycles, ably mounted with, say, the "Walkürenritt" turned on, and some judicious "pedalling" added, should produce a thrilling effect down Hyde Park way.

The opponents of Wagner have recently been much exhilarated by Count Tolstoi's vehement onslaught on that composer. The famous ex-novelist tried to hear "Siegfried," but gave it up as a bad job after one act and has since run amuck against Wagnerism. He attributes the craze to a species of hypnotism. Spiritualists, he declares, hold the same argument, for they aver that you are not able to give an opinion if you have not been present at séances and manifestations. "In other words," he continues, "you must pass some few hours in the company of people half-mad, and repeat the experiment a dozen times, and you will see what they see. In such conditions one sees what one likes. But there is a much simpler method of arriving at the same results—you have only to drink alcohol or smoke opium." The utterances of Tolstoi—who is a man of genius, though sadly warped of late years—command an attention, in view of his earlier achievements and singular personality, which is frequently out of all proportion to their intrinsic value. Wagnerism may be a craze, but it is not to be dismissed by such foolish arguments as the above.

A highly characteristic and hitherto unpublished letter of Richard Wagner is forming part of the Musical Exhibition now being held in Berlin. It is dated Lucerne, January 31, 1871, being addressed to a tenor singer of the Breslau Theatre, and runs as follows: "I hereby certify, at your request, that a medically attested catarrh renders a tenor singer incapable of interpreting the part of Lohengrin, and further express my opinion to the effect that the man who, in the case of a tenor singer so situated, nevertheless insists upon his (the tenor's) undertaking the part, is distinctly in the wrong place as director of a theatre, but might, on the other hand, be recommended with advantage for the governorship of a House of Correction.—Richard Wagner."

The many friends of Mr. Joseph Robinson, of Dublin, will be glad to hear that, upon the recommendation of Mr. Balfour, he has been granted a Civil List annuity of £50 in recognition of his many valuable services to the cause of music in Ireland during the last seventy years. It was for "old Joe Robinson," as his former pupils affectionately call the veteran musician, that Mendelssohn orchestrated his "Hear my prayer." On the 16th of the present month Mr. Robinson will be eighty-two. Many happy returns of the day to him!

In our next issue we hope to give a biographical sketch and portrait of Mr. A. J. Hipkins, the greatest authority on the pianoforte and its history in this country.

FACTS, RUMOURS, AND REMARKS.

It is to be supposed that the assumed names sent in by competitors at Eisteddfodau are, some of them at any rate, intended as complimentary to the rightful owners and not as indicating self-measurement on the part of the contestants. In that case, honours were paid, in a bass competition, to Raphael, Handel, Gounod, Mozart, Santley, Foli, Cromwell, and Punch. The selection is certainly comprehensive, though it betrays a peculiar lack of humour.

In a paragraph on American regimental bands I read that "the musicians are as warlike as their fellows, and just as anxious for a go at the Spaniards." This may be creditable to their bravery, but good musical material should not get in the way of bullets, and I trust that the bandsmen's colonels know how to repress a noble rage when it is out of place. As a matter of regulation, however, the military musicians are expected to fight, if need be, and to that end they go through a regular course of rifle practice.

Should the bandsmen, in dire emergency, go into action and get cut up, it is satisfactory to know that their places need not remain vacant. I read in the American Art Journal that the boys of South Brooklyn have formed themselves into a drum and fife corps, and adopted the name of Admiral Dewey as that of their organisation. Good lads! I bid them remember the drummer boy of Waterloo, who, when taken prisoner and brought before Napoleon, was told to beat a "retreat." "A retreat," exclaimed the little hero, "what's that!"?

In Wales competitions by male-voice choirs are becoming, if anything, even more popular than those by mixed voices. This was seen at Blaenau Festiniog during the recent Eisteddfod. Yet the American critic, Krehbiel, remarks: "Male choirs need not detain us long, since it may be said without injustice that their mission is more social than artistic. There are choirs composed exclusively of women, but they are even more unsatisfactory than the male choirs, for the reason that the bass voice leaves their harmony without sufficient foundation." This may be the opinion of America, but it certainly is not of Wales and England, where choirs of both kinds flourish. Music has "many mansions," and the wise musician delights in seeing them all occupied.

In next month's issue of this journal I shall have something to say regarding the recent meeting of the National Eisteddfod in the mountain town of Blaenau Festiniog. For the present I must be satisfied to indicate one or two features which seem to me worthy of note. One such is the vast preponderance of Welsh music in the programme. The selected pieces for use in competition contained examples of music other than Welsh, but each work had a native companion. Of the four concerts, the first (miscellaneous) contained the names of six Welsh composers, the second was given up to a Welsh oratorio, and if "Elijah" was performed at the third, compensation appeared at the fourth, which introduced a Welsh cantata. This may be called nourishing the native muse. Of the adjudicators, all save one were Welsh; but it should be mentioned that Dr. Roland Rogers was specially engaged for the chief choral competition, which was judged by two Englishmen and a Welshman.

A competition in sight-singing at this Eisteddfod had a ludicrous result. Although the Welsh are devoted followers of Tonic Sol-fa, they are remarkably shy of sight-singing tests, and only two quartet parties put in an appearance. The anthem put into their hands was not particularly easy nor very difficult, and the first party stumbled through it with many mistakes.

The second party, after much wobbling, came entirely to grief; following up some extraordinary noises by retreating from the platform amid roars of laughter. This does not say much for the reading ability of our friends across the Marches.

But the singing which was not sight-singing impressed me very much, so good was the quality of the voice, and so noteworthy, in many cases, the evidence of careful training and great natural feeling. From this it appears that Wales is improving as a nursery of public singers. I will go so far as to say that, in some instances which came under my notice, the young amateurs striving for a prize of £2 or so, were every whit as good as the average professional.

During the performance of "Elijah" Mr. Ffrangcon-Davies made a little speech to the audience. What it was about does not matter, the important fact being that it was a speech. I trust that the example will not be followed. An artist engaged upon such a work as "Elijah" does well to sink his individuality in the task he has undertaken, and ill to put himself forward more than necessity demands. Mr. Pfrangcon-Davies, however, has rather peculiar notions of what should be done in "Elijah."

In the first of my "Recollections" mention was made of Mr. James Watts, who removed from Wooton-under-Edge, Gloucestershire, many years ago, to some place in the North. As one of Mr. Watts's pupils I asked for further information concerning him, and have been kindly answered by Mr. J. Molineux, a professor of music resident in Preston. This gentleman writes, "When he (Mr. Watts) left Wooton, as you state, he was appointed, as the best out of twenty, to be organist of Ormskirk Parish Church, in succession to Mr. Heathcote, who had been organist fifty-six years. I was a boy when Mr. Watts came, and lived five miles from the town, but used to walk that distance to the Sunday School. . . . When Mr. Watts came he found a nice-toned organ, given by a lady. He traced it back to the time of Father Smith, or thereabouts, and wrote a pamphlet on it.

Mr. Molineux goes on to say that the Ormskirk organ, which had two manuals and no pedals, was successively enlarged till it became a fine instrument, fitted for such a player as Watts. He adds: "Mr. Watts was looked up to by all the people of Ormskirk and the districts around as a fine performer of good, solid Church music. . . . He had the run all round for teaching, and his advice was sought on all important musical changes. He died about six or eight years ago. I think Mr. Watts would be organist over forty years." Adding these forty years to the fifty-six of Mr. Heathcote, it follows that two organists served Ormskirk Church for close upon a century.

SIR JOHN STAINER ON CATHEDRAL MUSIC.

Whatever may have been the practice of former Professors of Music in the University of Oxford, no one can accuse Sir John Stainer of dry-as-dustic proclivities in the matter, or even in the manner, of his Professorial lectures. It is a great pity that his interesting utterances should not reach a larger audience than that which listens to him within the walls of the Sheldonian Theatre. As some means towards this desirable end we are glad to furnish our readers with some extracts from the Professor's own manuscript of his recent University lecture entitled "Our Cathedral Music," in the hope that similar discourses may in future find a place in these columns. "I hope some day to give you a lecture on 'The growth and use of chants,'" said Sir John in the early part of the subjoined lecture. We shall, therefore, "keep an eye" on this promised "Chant" lecture with a view to its authorised appearance, as in the present instance, in The Musical Times.

After tracing the historical growth of the "Service" (using the word in its technical sense), Sir John thus speaks of the treatment of the Nicene Creed:—

"Perhaps no movement of a complete service exhibits our altered views as to the objects and power of Church music more than a modern setting of the Nicene Creed. The musical treatment of this Creed has gone through the same phases as the Canticles, first clothed in a mechanically arranged set of chords, then treated contrapuntally, and now painted in all the contrasted colours of modern art. One setting stands alone, I refer to Marbecke's. I have often wondered whether he hoped this would serve as a model for future writers. His Credo, though essentially ecclesiastical, is far from being colourless; the Incarnatus, Et Resurrexit, and other portions give a very definite realistic impression, even when sung, as intended by Marbecke, in simple unison by men only, or when sung in octaves. This unusual combination of Church mode and picturesque representation is the secret of the immense popularity of this Credo. The most anti-Gregorian choirs, when they have once learned it properly, become intensely fond of it. But it is not easy to get it sung properly by ordinary professional choirs; its beauty only begins to appear when the music has become, by constant use, absolutely subservient to the words, as regards accent, rhythm, and expression. I recall one church in which Marbecke's Creed was sung without intermission for many years; the result was that the rendering was quite perfect. The music had become so adjusted to the words, that the words gave new force to the music, while the music gave a deeper meaning to the words. Of course what is ordinarily called musical accent and rhythm had disappeared almost entirely, but the sweet sounds, as a handmaid to the text, had become clothed in a beauty entirely their own. Here again is a form which might well be used as a model by living Church composers; because their efforts would be used in churches where the congregation might be suspicious of the introduction of Plain-song Masses, such as the "Missa de Angelis" and others. There are still some who look upon all music written in square notes as the small end of a papistic wedge."

The following remarks on the rendering of old services should receive attention:—

"Before leaving the subject of services, I should like to point out that much injustice is done to our earlier composers by the rigid 'barring' introduced by later editors like Boyce and others. As you all know, bars did not come into common use until after the middle of the seventeenth century.

"It is generally assumed that sixteenth century writers did not use bars, because such things had not then been invented.

"This is only a partial truth. Our ancestors had plenty of means of expressing the close of a measure, even as early as the first half of the fifteenth century; but they were wise enough to recognise the fact that when prose has to be set for voices, the unbroken succession of bars of equal length, so far from being an advantage, was often a hindrance to the proper accent and rhythm of the words. They knew well enough that one of the chief sources of the beauty of Church Plain-song was its freedom from the tyranny of bars, and with this Plain-song still ringing in their ears, they were not likely to allow themselves to be fettered when setting anew the Canticles in English. The bars should be cut out of the services by Tallis, Gibbons, Bird, Farrant, and others, and when thus placed before a choir, the singers should be told to bear in mind that it is the words which dictate the rhythm to the music, not the music which is to ruin the pronunciation and mar the sense of the words. If sung smoothly and properly all those syncopations, which now look and sound so awkward between bar and bar, would disappear.

"And yet more; many passages which now annoy us by their apparent disregard of the sense of the words, would be found to fall quite easily and naturally into alternating or contrasted portions of duple, triple, quadruple, or quintuple measure, and carry with them the sense of the words in the most obvious way. The maltreatment of old music by the introduction of bars is the more vicious now-a-days, because many people, even musicians, have an idea that the so-called accent which is said to occur on the first note of a bar, means that that note is to be sung with a 'bang.' It would be interesting to trace the evolution of this extraordinary notion."

"I have very little doubt that it originated in dance tunes played on instruments, in which strong emphasis is customary, perhaps even necessary, in order to mark the dancer's steps, and the rhythm of bodily movement. But dance rhythms were quite an early form of vocal part-music also, and whilst singing Balletts, Gagliards, and other dances, singers would naturally make similar sforzandos for a like purpose. We can thus see how singers may have become imbued with the idea that the first note of every bar requires to be sung louder. You will hardly credit it, but even now one may hear some Church music completely spoilt by the sforzando at the beginning of each bar, introduced by the choirmaster's direction. The absurdity of this must not make us forget that modern composers calculate that intelligent performers will emphasize the accents if the character of the music requires it; and, therefore, up to this point it may be argued that composers do recognise the existence of this emphasis. This is, however, only true to a very limited degree. But all music, I need hardly say, should be interpreted with reference to the date of its production; it is only thus that the composer's intention can possibly be carried out. And surely our store of sixteenth and early seventeenth century music deserves to be heard in its integrity, freed from the tyranny of the relentless bar-accent, and rendered with that solemn even step which betokens the spirit of calm meditation. All that I have been saying as to this matter of accent applies equally, of course, to the Church motets of the same early period. But in their case it is necessary to add one word of warning against the craze of modern editors and conductors for over-loading these compositions with a perpetual recurrence of diminuendo, piano, pianissimo, crescendo, forte, and fortissimo. This over-colouring of the unsensational sombre tints of early Church motets is just as much a vulgar anachronism as the introduction of the dance-tune 'bang' at the beginning of each bar; the creation of ever recurring violent contrasts of light and shade is equally foreign and incongruous to the spirit of the early Church style. It must have been noticed by many of you that all our large choirs and choruses can make a crescendo or diminuendo, and can sing very loud or very soft; but how seldom do we hear, for any length of time, a long passage or movement sung mezza-voce. There seems to be in these days a perpetual craving for contrast of force in music. I have not heard for many years what used to be called a 'diapason voluntary,' and one rarely hears a piece of Church music calmly and quietly sung. I suppose I am old-fashioned, but I certainly recall with pleasure the beautiful effect of mezza-voce singing in St. Paul's Cathedral in my boyhood."

Speaking of the early motet anthem, the Professor said:—

"Here I have to lament that with the exception of half-a-dozen well-used examples, the earliest English specimens of this, the purest form of vocal polyphony, have been allowed to fall into general disuse. Nor have any serious efforts been made to dig out of the sixteenth and early seventeenth century literature of English Church music some of the very many fine specimens of this important class of composition. But I am happy to say our younger Church musicians are considering this important question, and I hope ere long you will find that some very practical steps have been taken, not only to save from extinction the old motet anthems already known, but also to add to their number from sources only recently available."

The following bears upon the lecturer's views of our modern Cathedral music:—

"I wish now to say a few words about our most recent Church compositions. I am quite accustomed to hear modern Cathedral music severely criticised, not to say, roundly abused. This indiscriminating condemnation arises entirely from the fact that such critics point out some really weak new anthems and compare them with, not mediocre specimens of former days, but the masterpieces which have been handed down to us; from this is drawn the cruel and illogical conclusion that all modern Cathedral music is rubbish, and all old Cathedral music is splendid. But such critics quite forget that the few hundred fine anthems preserved in our Cathedral books are the survivors of many thousands of worthless contemporaneous compositions. Tons of rubbish have been from time to time sifted by precentors and organists before these few were selected. I am quite prepared to admit that a lot of very poor stuff has been written for the Church during the last fifty years, but I assert without fear of contradiction that posterity will be able to cull a very fair proportion of really fine music from the mixed mass. It is quite certain that posterity will conserve and cherish Wesley's 'Blessed be the God and Father' and 'The Wilderness,' Goss's 'Praise the Lord, O my soul,' and 'If we believe,' Ouseley's 'How lovely are Thy tents,' Sterndale Bennett's 'O that I knew where I might find Him,' Sullivan's 'I will mention the loving-kindness' and 'Who is like unto Thee,' Barnby's 'If we have borne the image of the earthy,' Steggall's 'Remember now thy Creator,' and a score more."

"If I were allowed to invert the process of the present-day critic, and compare these good modern specimens with some of the rubbish written in previous centuries, the comparison would be entirely in favour of modern music. But speaking seriously, there will, I believe, be a valuable store of music of this last half-century handed down for future Cathedral use, just as we have received a valuable selection culled from the contributions of previous periods. But if we are to cull the best specimens of modern Cathedral compositions, we must at least encourage and tend their general growth, or else we shall have nothing to cull from. Above all, I hope we shall remove that antipathy to modern Church music, simply because it is modern. The anthems of the Restoration period must have often been produced in the Chapel Royal almost before the ink was dry; and people forget that the compositions of Tallis, Byrd, and Gibbons once had this sad blemish, this repulsive taint of newness.

"Then, again, a large number of easy and very simple anthems have been called into existence by those excellent institutions, 'choral associations.' These anthems are nearly always taken into general use in each separate Parish Church after a choir festival is over. These and other anthems of the same simple type are pointed out by some critics as proofs of the decadence of Cathedral music. This is very unfair. The parochial anthems by recent Church musicians were never intended for Cathedral use at all. So far from having too many of these short effective parochial anthems, the supply is far too small. Many clergymen tell me that the occasional performance of an easy anthem, as, for instance, on Church festivals, is a great encouragement to a voluntary choir to attend practices regularly, and it is also an agreeable change to them after the constant routine of chants and hymns. My sympathies are entirely with the clergy in this matter, they do not want a Cathedral anthem, they want a Parish anthem, and they may well complain of the apathy of our living composers towards their wants. I really believe some of our young musicians would feel insulted if asked to write an anthem for 'Novello's Parish Choir Book,' or 'The Musical Times.' They would gladly compose cantatas, oratorios, symphonies, and operas, but how many really parochial anthems do we possess from the pens of Stanford, Parry, Sullivan, Cliffe, German, Somervell, Mackenzie? I know that, as a result, country clergy and their organists simply read the advertising columns of musical journals and take whatever has appropriate words and is easy, whether good or bad. The parochial clergy are, I think, quite justified in demanding music suited to their wants, and they are most wise if they do not allow their voluntary parochial choirs to try and soar in the higher realm of true Cathedral music; it is a mistake, you may be sure, to attempt to turn an ordinary Parish Church (especially in rural districts), musically speaking, into a little Cathedral.

"It is, however, equally necessary to guard against a danger which arises from the efforts of some well-meaning, but mistaken Deans who burn with a desire to turn their Cathedrals into big Parish Churches. Attempts have actually been made in one Cathedral to do away with the Sunday afternoon anthem, and introduce a hymn in its place. I have not the least objection to services of a thoroughly congregational and parochial character being held in our Cathedrals, but I confess I should like such services to be made quite separate and distinct from Cathedral services proper. These glorious piles which we, whilst enjoying, must remember we hold in trust as heirlooms, were raised by the devout hands of men who valued work more than talk, and who did not measure the depth of a worshipper's zeal by the loudness of his shouting. Congregationalism in Church music is a noble and edifying thing; no one, I assure you, joins in a hymn with more heartiness or with a more unpleasant voice than—myself. But when congregationalism, for which there is ample room in Parish Churches, is used as a leverage for ejecting the higher forms of our art from Cathedrals, it is time for us to make a stand against it. Can any music be too beautiful whose reverberating waves are to throb and break against such exquisite interlacing arcades and wondrously poised groined roofs? We pause to admire the jewelled tracery of cunningly wrought windows. May we not be allowed with equal admiration to listen to the subtle intricacies of harmony and counterpoint surmounted and crowned with their flowing outline of sweet-toned melody? Does not beautiful Cathedral music seem to combine with the very fabric in inspiring us with that calm reflective spirit for which the hurry and hustle of life make so many of us crave? This treasure-house should contain beautiful things, new as well as old; and if it be sacrilege to let the old die out, surely it would be sheer ingratitude if this age should fail to contribute something good which is also new."

CHURCH MUSIC.

A musical service was held in St. David's Cathedral on the 1st ult., which included Dykes's melodious Te Deum in F, anthems by Attwood, Stainer, and Vincent, with organ pieces by Smart, Wély, and Salomé, played by Mr. H. C. Morris, the Cathedral organist.

The annual dedication festival at St. Peter's Church, Dulwich Common, was held on Sunday, the 3rd ult., the collections throughout the day being awarded to the indefatigable organist and choirmaster, Mr. J. H. L. Gauntlett. The musical portion of the services included Te Deum and Jubilate, Foster in A; Holy Communion, Stainer in E flat; Magnificat and Nunc dimittis, Barnby in E flat; and the anthems "O Saving Victim" (Gounod), "Hail, Festal Day" (Baden Powell), and "Rejoice in the Lord alway" (Purcell).

From time to time not only are performances of new Church works announced, but the occasional revivals of neglected music of interest are recorded. Niedermeyer's Mass in B minor and Kalliwoda's Mass in A have recently been heard in churches of the Roman Communion, and in this connection it may be asked why should not the Mass in D minor by Rinck, of Organ School fame, be revived? The composer, we believe, had some experience as organist at an important Roman Catholic Church. This Mass, if a little dry at times, has movements characterised by real dignity and devotional feeling, and the whole work is well adapted for Church use.

There seems to be a prospect of the subject of Church music being dealt with in some form at the next Church Congress. It is to be hoped this will prove to be true, and that some amends may be made in this connection for the too long continued neglect of a subject of vital importance at these meetings.

A very meritorious rendering of Mendelssohn's "St. Paul," at St. Paul's Church, Kent Town, by the East Molesey Choral Society, was recently a source of great gratification to a large number of listeners. The fine work, with its congregational element in the chorale, is not only the last of the great Church oratorios of the Bach type, but by its intense personal interest in connection with the leading character, and its deep religious feeling, is one of the finest of our available "musical sermons." Much is it to be regretted that our congregations do not prepare and perform their part with more earnestness and effect. Every encouragement should be given to this end; and a book of words with the melodies of the several chorales, after the manner of the issue of the text of Bach's "Passion" music, it may be hoped, will be called for ere long, and meet with extensive employment. The congregation part in the music of all forms of the "musical service" demands increased attention and well-considered cultivation.

The twelfth annual festival of the Exeter Diocesan Choral Association was held in Exeter Cathedral, on the afternoon of the 5th ult., when forty-nine choirs were represented by 1,302 clergy and singers. The chief features of the service were a Magnificat and Nunc dimittis, by Mr. Charles Macpherson, assistant-organist of St. Paul's Cathedral; Elvey's anthem "Praise the Lord and call upon His Name," and at the close of the service a Te Deum by Mr. G. R. Sinclair, organist of Hereford Cathedral, all of which were excellently rendered. Four members of the Royal Marine Band (Plymouth Division) co-operated in the accompaniments with admirable effect, and the organ accompaniment throughout was played by Dr. Wood, organist of Exeter Cathedral, with his customary skill. The whole service reflected great credit upon Mr. T. Roylands-Smith, the honorary choirmaster of the Association, who discharged his duties with marked ability.

ORGAN MUSIC.

Quite in keeping with the reputation of so eminent a performer is the self respect displayed by Mr. Kendrick Pyne in the selection of the programmes given on the very beautiful organ in the Manchester Town Hall. These words are also true in connection with the schemes presented by other notable organ-players. Further, it is remarkable that the masters of the organ-playing art are invariably able not only to display their special judgment and idiosyncrasies in the choice of music, but are also able to express, even through the fixity of organ tone and the artificial character of its mediums of expression, their own personal methods of thought. Indeed, there is no more remarkable evidence of the power of individuality than is revealed in the various methods and differing modes of thought displayed in the organ recitals of our leading organists.

Mr. Pyne's final recital of the season, given on June 25, well illustrated his own view of the organ recital as an artistic entirety. The programme consisted of four pieces, including one arrangement for the instrument of a popular duet from Mozart's "Die Zauberflöte" and Gounod's "Wedding March," introducing the National Anthem. The great features of the performance were two typical organ works, Mendelssohn's too much neglected Prelude and Fugue in D minor and a fine rendering of Widor's Fifth Organ Symphony; the complete work, occupying some forty minutes in performance, was loudly applauded, and Mr. Pyne was twice recalled to receive the congratulations of a highly sympathetic audience.

On the 7th ult. Mr. Ernest Newton gave a recital at St. Thomas's Church, Portman Square, with an effective programme, including Guilmant's "Marche Funèbre et chant Séraphique," Tours's effective Allegretto Grazioso, a "Pastorale" by Merkel, and Smart's excellent "Con moto Moderato (En forme d'Ouverture)," to quote the somewhat complicated title. During the past month the programmes of Mr. Herbert C. Morris, at St. David's Cathedral, have included Rheinberger's Organ Sonatas, 5 and 6; Grand Chœur, Macmaster; Meditation in F, Chipp; "Abendlied," Jackson, and several typical specimens of the modern French and Belgian Schools.

At St. John's, New Clee, on the 10th ult., Mr. A. J. Lancashire gave a recital. Mendelssohn's First Sonata, Smart's "Choral with variations," and Böellmann's "Gothic Suite" were leading features of his programme. Mr. E. L. Price recently gave a recital as part of the proceedings of "Speech Day" at Trent College. His scheme included Gavotte Moderne, Lemare; Cantilène Pastorale, Guilmant; and the March in Wagner's "Tannhäuser." The organ at Lewisham Congregational Chapel, after being enlarged by Hunter and Son, was lately re-opened by Mr. Frank Idle, whose programme included typical specimens of the organ works of Bach, Mendelssohn, and certain esteemed composers of the modern French school.

The following gentlemen passed the examination for Fellowship, held in July at the Royal College of Organists: J. H. Bridger (Farnborough), G. R. H. Clark (London), W. Hoyle (Coventry), F. Midgley (Perth), C. J. K. O. Scott (Romsey), R. V. Williams (London). The examination was attended by some seventy-seven candidates. The following also gained Associateship: G. P. Barraud, E. Bayliss, C. J. Biggs, V. Blount, E. C. Broadhurst, A. G. Crouch, E. A. N. Cullum, J. Dann, F. A. Dibb, A. Dinsdale, A. H. Dudley, W. F. B. Dunnill, E. J. Francis, W. K. Hamilton, W. H. Harris, F. E. Hollingshead, R. B. Hudson, S. Lees, R. Mussell, H. F. Nicholls, K. Parkhouse, V. G. Rivers, O. Robinson, Miss C. L. Simco, D. A. Slater, J. Soar, Miss J. A. M. Towers, G. F. Wood. The number of candidates was 189. The solo playing tests at the Christmas Fellowship Examination will be Concertstück in E flat minor, Merkel; Fugue in C minor, Krebs; Chromatic Fantasia (the Fugue of the same work will not be required), Thiele.

The programmes of the recitals given by Mr. J. M. Preston, of St. George's Church, Newcastle-on-Tyne, during the past month, included "Grand Chœur et Menuet" in F, Deshayes; Adagio and Scherzo (Fifth Sonata), Guilmant; Sonata (Op. 4), E. Prout; Andante, Max Peters; Choral-Sonata in E minor, Merkel; Postlude in C minor, C. S. Heap; Nocturne, J. H. Gower, and Sonata in F sharp minor, F. de la Tombelle. The same organist, playing at Trinity Wesleyan Church, Whitley, Northumberland, on the 11th ult., included in his list of pieces: Savoyard Chant, H. W. Wareing; Choral Song and Fugue, S. S. Wesley; Toccata in F sharp minor, J. L. Hatton; Berceuse, Oliver King; Offertoire in C minor, J. Grison; Andante and Scherzo (Fourth Organ Symphony), Widor.

Mr. W. H. Vipond Barry, organist of St. Bartholomew's church, Clyde Road, Dublin, at his recital there on June 18, included Dr. J. C. Culwick's new Organ Sonata, No. 2, in D, this being its first performance. At the Baker Street Church of England High School, on June 29, Miss Edroff gave an excellent recital "in aid of the school organ." The programme included Mendelssohn's Sonata in A and Bach's Toccata and Fugue in D minor, admirably played, as were the lighter pieces, by the fair performer.

Organ builders from time to time turn their attention to the more effective construction of small as well as large organs. In this direction the "Positive" organ invented by Mr. Thomas Casson, with mechanism for transposition and the means of strengthening the melody part of music for congregational use by means of an ingenious stop duplication applied to the upper stratum of the chords played, secures a special form of usefulness; and the compact instrument brings credit to its builders for the excellent tone-qualities produced. Again, Mr. A. Kirkland, of Holloway, has produced what he aptly calls the "Minster Model" organ, which, by its judiciously selected and well-voiced stops of admirable qualities of tone, and by its cleverly arranged system of coupling movements, gives combinations of such depth and sweetness as more than suggest the effects of much larger instruments, softened as it were into a semblance of the reflective sounds of power subdued by distance. There is a distinct place for such well applied ingenuity in the construction of good, small, and withal cheap organs.

It would not be thought ordinarily likely to find old organs in new countries. However, a contemporary has an account of an instrument originally built by Avery, once a builder of high repute in London, in 1779, which was formerly in St. Paul's Church, Auckland, New Zealand. Recently this venerable organ has been rebuilt, and of course modernised, for the Baptist Chapel, Ponsonby, Auckland. Of some, though less interest, is the account of an organ playing, it is said, no less than thirty tunes by means of three barrels, which was sent to a missionary church in the same colony about seventy years ago, and is now in the Wanganui Museum.

Not the least satisfactory pleasure gained by the re-opening of the Alexandra Palace has been found in the stately sounds of the fine organ. Amongst other performances upon this instrument, recitals given by Mr. F. Gostelow, on the 1st ult., may be mentioned, the programmes including Rêverie in F and Minuet in D (Driffill) and Bridal March (Sangster).

Of marked interest and value are the beautiful Air with Variations in D and stately Allegro in B flat, by Mendelssohn, posthumous works lately published by Messrs. Novello and Company, Limited. During the forthcoming recital season these characteristic and masterly compositions will, no doubt, be frequently played.

ROYAL OPERA, COVENT GARDEN.

"Hero and Leander."

The two novelties promised this season at Covent Garden have both been produced in the last month, and the first to claim attention was Signor Mancinelli's setting of Boito's version of "Hero and Leander," or, to give it its Italian title, in which tongue it was produced, "Ero e Leandro." It will doubtless be remembered that this opera was produced in cantata form at the Norfolk and Norwich Festival of 1896, on October 8, when Signor Mancinelli's work was very favourably criticised. An entirely different position must be taken when judging it as produced on the stage, and attention is of course first directed to the libretto. How to develop three acts out of the single incident of Leander swimming across the Hellespont to visit his lady-love Hero was the problem that Boito had to solve, and it is not astonishing that he has but partially succeeded. The addition to the classic tale of an amorous and revengeful High Priest adds to the tragic element of the story, but fails to provide sufficiently for the lack of dramatic action, and recourse has been made to soliloquies and love duets. Very heavy demands were thus made upon the composer, and that Signor Mancinelli has achieved as much success as he undoubtedly has, proves him to be a musician of great resource and no little inventive skill.

The curtain rose upon a charming scene. It is the time of the Aphrodisia, the festivals of Venus, and the versatile and obliging Covent Garden chorus were seen in adoration of the Goddess of Beauty, as they raised their voices "through the ambient ether" in an effective hymn of praise. The action begins with the entrance of the high priest, Ariopharnes, who is followed by Hero and her priestesses, and by Leander, the victor in the recent games. Hero is commanded to crown Leander, which results in the latter at once falling in love with her, and, in a charming melodious number called "Anacreontic," giving expression to his passion. When he and the adoring crowd have been dismissed, Ariopharnes offers Hero the "Venus Celestial" or the "Earthly Venus," the former signifying banishment to the "Maiden's Tower" on the Hellespont, and the latter submission to himself. Hero says, "Than thy kisses, the tomb is more welcome," an answer which makes Ariopharnes forget his priestly dignity, and indulge in melodramatic remarks. Signor Mancinelli has fully realised the dramatic significance of this scene and written some charming music to Hero's subsequent address to a shell, which she takes off the altar of Venus and questions as to her ultimate fate. This solo is characterised by genuine Southern grace of melody, and is worked up to an effective climax as the shell predicts disaster. At its conclusion Leander comes back in search of Hero and is discovered by Ariopharnes, but the last-named permits the inevitable love duet to take place, remarking "Then, only then, my vengeance shall prove appalling." The music of the lovers is more remarkable for grace and picturesque orchestration than for inspiration, but it is admirably laid out for the voices and it ends dramatically by Hero consulting a statue of Apollo and praying that his "decree be spoken," which is done by Ariopharnes, who stands behind the statue and utters the word "death," upon which the curtain falls.

Some of the most remarkable orchestral effects occur in the next act. A shower of consecutive fifths precedes the rising of the curtain, which reveals the Temple of Venus brilliantly illuminated by torches and coloured lamps. The chorus sing some attractive strains, while the Priestesses execute various expressive movements, culminating in a sacred dance, and at the conclusion Ariopharnes announces that Hero, at the command of Venus, is to be banished to the "Maiden's Tower," to signal the approach of storms. Ariopharnes interpolates his address to the worshippers with asides to Hero, offering her her freedom if she will accept his overtures. This is a clumsy method for heightening the dramatic situation, and it obliges the High Priest to leave his throne, an undignified proceeding. This might be avoided by placing Hero nearer to him, but the desire for movement caused Hero and the High Priest to walk about the stage in a manner which was inconsistent with the solemnity of the occasion. Leander's attempt at rescue is so obviously futile as to be childish, and the redeeming features of this act are the cleverness of the vocal part-writing and the dance.

The last scene is the interior of the Maiden's Tower, and it is opened with a chorus sung by sailors who are apparently passing on the sea beneath. After this the composer has been confronted with a soliloquy for Hero of ninety-two lines, but the exacting task has been courageously attacked, and melodic invention and remarkable command of orchestral colour and resource fairly sustain the attention during the ten minutes which the number takes. At the end Leander arrives and has a duet with Hero, which lasts for another twelve minutes, and again taxes the composer's skill to the utmost. At its conclusion a storm arises, Ariopharnes enters with his priests, and Leander, to escape them, plunges into the sea. Hero prays for a sign of his safety, the rocks of her tower are split asunder by the lightning, and Hero falls dead on perceiving Leander's drowned body.

Great pains had manifestly been bestowed upon the rehearsal of the opera, and the choruses were rendered with an intelligence and zeal which were very notable. Madame Eames as Hero sang the part with great beauty of tone and method, but acted coldly, which detracted in a considerable degree from the effectiveness of Hero's long solo in the last act. The part of Leander was sustained by M. Salèza, who sang well and acted with his usual impetuosity; but the most satisfactory embodiment was that of Ariopharnes, by M. Plançon, to whom the character was admirably suited. The scenic arrangements were the reverse of convincing. There were some very fine marble pillars in the second scene, but it was somewhat disturbing to find their rigidity affected by the skirts of the dancers; and the action of the rocks under the effect of the stage lightning was peculiar. The upper portions turned somersaults, and the lower parts ran away on either side with phenomenal celerity and smoothness. Starched muslin skirts and abortive peplums revealing pink tights were not ideal dresses for the dancers in Venus's Temple. The opera, however, was very warmly applauded, and the composer, who conducted, received quite an ovation at the conclusion. A second performance was given on the 15th ult.

"Henry VIII."

The second novelty was M. Saint-Saëns's opera in four acts entitled "Henry VIII.," which was produced for the first time in London on the 14th ult. "Henry VIII." is the French master's fifth operatic work, having been preceded by "La Princesse Jeune" (1872), "Le Timbre d'Argent" (1877), "Samson et Dalila" (1877), and "Etienne Marcel" (1879), and it was produced for the first time at the Paris Opéra in 1883. It is necessary to remember this date in judging "Henry VIII.," for although the composer has made extensive use of what may be termed associative themes he also has followed in great measure, with regard to form, traditional operatic lines. The libretto is the combined work of MM. Leonce Détroyat and Armand Silvestre, who seem to have been much more anxious to write a dramatic book than to be faithful to history. The opera is preceded by a brief prelude, which, however, should be carefully listened to. It is founded on a melody which M. Gounod said that M. Saint-Saëns found in the Queen's library at Buckingham Palace. Whether this be so or no it is frequently referred to, and is made to typify the English character. When the curtain rises the necessary explanation of the commencement of the action is given in a conversation between Don Gomez and the Duke of Norfolk, the former being the Spanish Ambassador, who has got himself appointed to the post in order to be near Anne Boleyn. Norfolk, however, tells him that she has been appointed Maid of Honour to the Queen, and that he has a rival in the King. Norfolk's declaration that "Pour Henry huit il n'est chose sacrée" ("There is nothing sacred to Henry VIII.") is set to the King's theme, which is subsequently treated with much subtlety. The Court then enter and converse in a solidly written chorus on the recent condemnation of the Duke of Buckingham. Henry appears, and the first important number of the work is his solo, in which he complains of the variable manner in which Anne receives his amorous advances. This is followed by an interview between Catherine and Henry, the former vainly pleading for the life of Buckingham. The entrance of Anne is the commencement of a very dramatic scene in which the Court and Catherine comment in horror on the fate of Buckingham, who goes by to execution, while Henry, taking advantage of this incident, makes love to Anne Boleyn. The composer has manifestly bestowed much thought on this portion, and the vocal parts towards the close are twelve in number and very effectively laid out.

The second act opens in Richmond Park, with a graceful two-part chorus sung by the Court. Another two-part chorus for women's voices heralds the approach of Anne, who subsequently has an interview with Don Gomez, from which it appears that she is still in love with him, but ambitious to be the queen. They are disturbed by the entrance of Henry, who dismisses Don Gomez, and, led on by Anne's coquettishness, finally declares that she shall be Queen of England. The music in this duet is thoroughly French in character, but the vocal parts are melodious and interesting to follow. A stormy scene between Catherine and Anne follows as a natural sequence, and ends in the victory of the latter, when Henry and his Court return. In the original version this act is closed by a ballet described as a fête populaire, in which Highlanders dance to some English tunes on Richmond Hill. This was wisely omitted at Covent Garden, and its place taken by a well-written octet, sung by the principal members of the Court, which was also in the original score, but omitted to make way for the ballet.

In the third act the librettists have hastened historical events in a somewhat amusing manner. The scene is Westminster Hall, and before the curtain falls Catherine has been divorced, the King has thrown off the allegiance to Rome, declared himself head of the English Church, and signified his intention of marrying Anne Boleyn—about the most remarkable condensation of time on record. The music commences with a pompous march as the Court assemble, and the choruses, which are dramatically conceived, occupy a considerable portion of this part of the score, very effective use being made at the end of the theme heard in the opening prelude.

It is seldom that the last act of an opera is the best, but it is so in this instance. The first scene takes place in the apartments of Anne, who is now Queen, and it is opened by the Coda of Byrd's variations on the "Carman's Whistle," which, written in 3-4 time, is made to introduce the Minuet danced by the Queen's ladies. In an interview with Gomez she learns that, although he has burned all her letters, the divorced Catherine has one in which Anne has declared her passion for Don Gomez, and this leads to a very fine situation which closes the scene. The scene changes to Catherine's apartment at "Kimbolth" (Kimbolton). Catherine sings a very expressive lament over her fate, in which it is notable that in the course of five lines the composer changes the tempo from 5-4 to 3-4, back to 5-4, 3-4, 4-4, 3-4, 5-4, 6-4, and 3-2. Anne enters and pleads for the compromising letter, and, as Catherine produces it, Henry arrives and also demands it as a proof of Anne's unfaithfulness to himself. As Catherine refuses to give it up, Henry addresses Anne in endearing terms, in the hopes to excite revengeful feelings in Catherine. The proceeding is contemptible to the last degree, but it is a magnificent dramatic situation, which is terminated by Catherine flinging the letter into the fire and falling back dead, the opera ending as Henry utters the ominous words addressed to Anne—

Morte avec son secret!
Mais si j'apprends jamais
Qu'on s'est raillé de moi
La hache désormais.

This quartet is undoubtedly one of the best numbers in the work, the sentiments which agitate the characters being finely expressed, in a simple but very effective manner. In its entirety the opera is not so fine a work as "Samson et Dalila," but it is an extremely interesting example of M. Saint-Saëns's inventive skill, versatility, and finished craftsmanship. All the effects striven for are secured, and the scoring in particular is a source of delight to the cultured musician. Mdlle. Pacary as Catherine sang with a dramatic force and effectiveness of which she had scarcely been held capable, and her embodiment will undoubtedly increase her reputation as an operatic artist in this country. The part of Anne Boleyn is written for a mezzo-soprano and ranges from the lower B flat to the A in Alt, and consequently suffers by contrast with the music of Catherine, which is written for a high soprano. Madame Heglon, however, who made her first appearance at Covent Garden as Anne, is an accomplished actress as well as an experienced vocalist, and although the higher notes of her voice are hard and unpleasant, especially when forced, those of the medium and lower registers are very fine. M. Renaud sang excellently in the title-rôle, and M. Bonnard was as efficient as usual as Don Gomez. New dresses of brilliant description had been provided, and considerable care had manifestly been bestowed on the rehearsals. There were, however, the usual blunders in the scenic arrangements, the walls of Catherine's room, for instance, terminating long before the ceiling commenced. Signor Mancinelli conducted, and the composer was called on the stage and heartily applauded by an audience which had received the work throughout the evening with great cordiality.

Only brief notice is called for concerning the other operas which have been mounted this season. Madame Melba made her rentrée, on June 28, in the title-rôle of "La Traviata," the music of which she sang delightfully. In spite of the recent liberal education in Wagner, the house was crowded; and it was a remarkable fact that not one of the principal characters was personated by an Italian.

On the 7th ult. Madame Melba sustained the part of Rosina in Rossini's "Il Barbiere di Siviglia," again singing with great brilliancy, but presenting a reading more suggestive of a mischief-loving English girl than an intriguing signorina. A very successful début as Figaro was made by Signor Campanari, who used a fine-toned baritone voice with artistic control. MM. Bonnard, Edouard de Reszke, and Carbone were also excellent as the Conte d'Almaviva, Basilio, and Bartolo respectively.

We probably have to thank Fräulein Ternina for the only performance this season, on the 9th ult., of Beethoven's "Fidelio," in which it is not too much to say that she presented one of the finest embodiments of the devoted wife seen on the Covent Garden stage. Fräulein Ternina was ably supported by Fräulein von Artner as Marzelline and by Herren Dippel, Feinhals, Wittekopf, Von Milde, and Breuer. The work was conducted by Herr Zumpe, and the ensemble was the best that he has secured.

Mozart's "Don Giovanni" was mounted on the 21st ult., when M. Renaud gave a fine embodiment of the title-rôle and Mdlle. Zelie de Lussan was admirable as Zerlina. Madame Nordica, as Donna Anna, rendered the music with Wagnerian emphasis, and Miss Suzanne Adams sang sweetly and with much charm as Donna Elvira, but otherwise left something to desire. The male parts were filled by MM. Edouard de Reszke, Bonnard, Gilibert, and Journet. Signor Mancinelli conducted.

Verdi's "Aïda," the principal characters in which were sustained by Madame Nordica, Miss Marie Brema, Herr Dippel, M. Plançon, and Signor Campanari, was performed on the 24th ult., and the season was terminated on the following night with Gounod's "Roméo et Juliette."

DR. JOACHIM AND MR. LEONARD BORWICK.

Chamber Concert.

July was commenced in a memorably artistic manner by a chamber concert given, on the 1st ult., by Dr. Joachim and Mr. Leonard Borwick, at St. James's Hall. The programme consisted of four sonatas for violin and pianoforte and Tartini's familiar example in this form, "Il Trillo del Diavolo." The selection began with Bach's Sonata for violin and clavier in E, the third of the six which he composed, and an excellent specimen of his style. Both executants seemed to thoroughly enjoy the music, and it is doubtful if the work ever received a more brilliant and sympathetic interpretation. Mozart's Sonata in A (No. 17) was followed by Tartini's familiar sonata "Il trillo del diavolo." A very fine interpretation was given of Beethoven's Sonata in C minor (Op. 30, No. 2), but the climax of the evening may be said to have been the performance of Brahms's beautiful composition in G (Op. 78), which concluded the selection and was interpreted with rare keenness of perception of the spirit of the music and consummate executive ability.

RECITALS AND CHAMBER CONCERTS.

Miss Irene von Brennerberg gave her first violin recital in London, on the 1st ult., at the Salle Erard, and proved herself to be a very promising young artist. The quality of tone Miss Brennerberg produced from her instrument was sympathetic and agreeable, and her renderings of Sarasate's "Zigeunerweisen" and other pieces were distinguished by freedom of bowing, good phrasing, and musical feeling. Miss Mathilde Verne played some pianoforte pieces with taste, and Señor Guetary sang several songs.

M. Pachmann concluded his series of pianoforte recitals at St. James's Hall on the 2nd ult., when his programme consisted entirely of excerpts from Chopin. The selection was commenced with the Andante Spianato and Polonaise (Op. 22). The rendering of the former was simply perfect, but the reading of the Polonaise was less satisfactory, its exuberance and spirit being sacrificed to a delicacy and sentiment foreign to its nature. The first movement of the Sonata in B minor (Op. 58) also suffered from a lack of accentuation of the "Maestoso" element, but otherwise the work was superbly played. The Scherzo was treated with fascinating crispness and delicacy, and in the slow movement the very soul of the music seemed to speak from the instrument, and the rendering was a magnificent example of expressive legato playing. M. Pachmann avoided the sharp contrast made by pianists who commence the "Finale" forte, the movement in this instance being opened quietly and subsequently worked up to a fine climax, a method which accentuated the poetical nature of the Sonata. The Impromptu in A flat (Op. 29) was exquisitely played, and the characteristics of the Mazurka in B minor were happily expressed. Other enjoyable performances were those of the Scherzo in B minor (Op. 31) and the Studies in thirds and on the black keys. The large attendances at these recitals suggest that when M. Pachmann elects to visit London again he will be very welcome.

Master Wolodia Roujitzky, who made his first appearance in England, on the 5th ult., at the Salle Erard, is another of those abnormally gifted children who, with judicious training, should provide for the musical requirements of the future. He is not yet eight years old, but his pianoforte playing shows an intuitive musical feeling, and he has a command of the keyboard which entitles him to be ranked amongst the so-called musical prodigies of to-day. He was heard in the Presto from Bach's "Italian" Concerto, Schubert's Impromptu in E flat (Op. 90, No. 2), Chopin's Impromptu in A flat, and other pieces, all of which were played with marvellous executive fluency and taste for one of such tender years. Some violin pieces were contributed by Mr. Gordon Tanner.

Miss Edie Reynolds, one of our most talented young English violinists, gave a chamber concert, on the 8th ult., at the Salle Erard, and opened a well selected programme with Brahms's Trio in E flat for horn, violin, and pianoforte, in which she was assisted by Mr. Borsdorf and Miss Lucie Hillier. Miss Reynolds showed satisfactory advancement as an executant in the Canzonetta and Allegro vivacissimo from Tschaïkowsky's Concerto in D, and with Miss Hillier played with notable taste and brilliancy Halvorsen's Suite in G minor for violin and pianoforte. Several songs contributed by Miss Amelie Molitor and Mr. Franklin Clive, and some recitations by Miss Helen Mar, completed an attractive programme.

Miss Winifred Hewitt, an English violinist and pupil of M. Johannes Wolff, gave satisfactory proof of her progress at the Salle Erard, on the 12th ult., when she held a concert, at which she was assisted by the Hon. Margaret Henniker, Mr. Kennerly Rumford, and M. Joseph Hollman. Miss Hewitt's style reflects in a measure that of her teacher, and when she has gained greater confidence and command of expression, her playing will be still more attractive than it is at present. She has acquired an admirable legato, which was advantageously shown in her rendering of Thomé's "L'Extase," and her fluency in rapid passages was displayed in Hubay's "Echo des Alpes" and in Wieniawski's "Air Russe."

M. MAUREL'S LECTURE-RECITAL.

Students of vocal art will remember the interest engendered by a lecture on singing, delivered at the Lyceum Theatre in 1892 by the eminent French baritone, M. Victor Maurel. On the occasion in question he put forward views of which he promised the amplification in a volume subsequently to be published. Various circumstances, however, caused M. Maurel to neglect for a time the didactic side of his artistic activity, and it is only lately that he has again come forward as a penman, bent on drawing attention to various details in the training of operatic singers that his long experience and remarkable analytical powers have suggested to him. This time, however, it was less the training of the voice than the rôle of the vocalist as interpreter of the poetic, emotional, or dramatic meaning of the music sung that occupied his attention, and it was this that formed the subject of a series of lecture-recitals delivered during May of this year in Paris. In these M. Maurel traced the gradual progress of vocal music from the sixteenth century to the present day, and its change from an art intended solely to please the ear (l'arte del bel canto) to one appealing also to the feelings and the intelligence, and designed to express the variety of passions demanded by modern music-drama and the greatest examples of vocal art intended for concert use.

At his recital at St. James's Hall, on the 12th ult., M. Maurel gave a very condensed version of his Paris lecture; but an excellent English translation of it had been prepared by Mr. Edgar F. Jacques, who, assisted by Mr. A. Kalisch, had also provided translations of the words of the songs, and of the subsequent remarks made by M. Maurel on the peculiarities of their settings and the school of composition to which the music belonged. M. Maurel's great command of vocal expression enabled him to point his comments with apt significance, and the examples had been chosen with admirable discretion and artistic judgment. The first song, given as an illustration of l'arte del bel canto, was Lotti's "Pur dicesti," in the rendering of which M. Maurel showed the "art of beautiful singing" in perfection. The following lyrics were Stradella's "Pietà Signore," the fine air "De noirs pressentiments," from Gluck's "Iphigénie en Tauride," and "Léonore viens," from Donizetti's "La Favorita," all of which were finely interpreted. No excerpt was made from Wagner's works, because "nothing could be chipped off the Wagnerian block"; but from Verdi's operas a very happy choice was made in Iago's Credo from "Otello." Beethoven's "Adelaide," and some modern French songs, together with several pianoforte duets, which were vivaciously played by the Mdlles. Douste de Fortis, were also included in the programme.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

The usual performances by the students of the dramatic and operatic classes of the Royal Academy of Music at the close of the summer term took place on the 19th and 20th ult., in the concert-room of the Institution. The dramatic works presented on the former date were Sir Charles Young's comedietta in one act, entitled "Petticoat Perfidy," an amusing but decidedly ungallant little piece; and Lord Lytton's drama "The Lady of Lyons." The exponents of feminine perfidy were Ethel Hall, C. Copland, and L. H. McGrath, the last-named, as the vivacious and obliging lady's maid, showing much aptitude for the stage. "The Lady of Lyons" was a difficult task to place before students, but it was courageously attacked, and the title-rôle was sustained with conspicuous success by Miss Chatwin, who evinced marked histrionic talent. Annie Child's reading of the part of Widow Melnotte was also excellent, and Janet Duff was efficient as Madame Deschapelles. Cecil Rose's embodiment of Claude Melnotte indicated decided ability, and, save in the cottage scene after the marriage, in which he lost artistic control, the personation was distinguished by many praiseworthy features. The parts of Colonel Damas and Beauseant were ably played by Aubrey Prust and A. L. Soames.

Three operatic excerpts occupied the following evening, the bill consisting of the first scene from the second act of Verdi's "Aïda," the Garden scene from Gounod's "Faust," and the second act of Bizet's "Carmen." The great duet in the first-named was excellently rendered by Ethel M. Wood and Harriet E. Crichton, the former singing with genuine dramatic intensity as Aïda. In the excerpt from "Faust" Margaret S. Drysdale sang sympathetically and conscientiously as Marguerite, and the other parts were fairly well sung by Mrs. Julia Franks, Alice Schnelders, Ford Waltham, and Whitworth Mitton. The most successful effort was the interpretation of the Cabaret scene from Bizet's opera. Mrs. Julia Franks as Carmen sang with great expressive charm and evinced considerable dramatic talent, but she has yet to acquire the art of listening, a very important matter. At present, when not singing, her face gives the impression that she is thinking of her part. Her efforts were well supported by Whitworth Mitton, who impersonated Don José with considerable success, and sang with much taste. Robert Bradford as Escamillo and Arthur L. Soames as Remendado also merit praise and encouragement. The dance was executed in a sprightly fashion by Ethel Beach and Evelyn Wade, and the performance in its entirety reflected great credit on Mr. G. H. Betjemann, who conducted.

On the following afternoon there was a chamber concert in St. James's Hall, the programme including several compositions by students, and these may be enumerated. The first consisted of an Andante and Scherzo from a pianoforte trio in G minor, by W. H. Reed; two duets for female voices by Miss Amy Horrocks, entitled "April showers" and "The skylark's wooing," are fresh and pretty, and were piquantly rendered by Ethel M. Wood and Mrs. Franks. There were likewise an Allegro from a violin and pianoforte sonata in C minor, by Stephen Champ; three pianoforte sketches by Mabel Colyer, and a clever ballet suite in A, by Harry Farjeon, played by the ensemble class under Mr. Emile Sauret.

On Friday afternoon, the 22nd ult., in the Queen's Hall, H.R.H. the Duchess of York distributed the annual prizes to a large number of students. This ceremony was preceded by a brief concert, commencing with Wieniawski's second Polonaise in A and F, for violin, which was played with splendid precision by the ensemble class. The delightful part-songs, "Rejoice, for Love is lord," and "O thou divine," from Sir Alexander Mackenzie's music to "The Bride of Love," were beautifully sung, and there were some brief speeches, the general impression made on all sides being that the Royal Academy of Music is at present in a very prosperous condition.

The following prizes have been awarded after competition during the past month:—The Parepa-Rosa Prize to Edith Nutter (a native of London), Margaret Chatwin being highly commended; the Robert Newman Prize to Walter Vale (a native of London); the Charles Lucas Prize to Percy Hilder Miles (a native of Erith, Kent); the Walter Macfarren Prizes to Elsie E. Horne (of London) and Bernard C. Flanders (of Walthamstow); the Charlotte Walters Prizes to Margaret Chatwin and Herbert Bagnall.

THE ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

Five Pupils' concerts in one month, and that month July—and July in London! It is well that the Concert Hall at the College is a nice, airy place, where the winds of heaven blow from every quarter at all times and keep the critic's head cool. Seriously, the output of performers is becoming quite formidable and our stock of adjectives utterly inadequate for the task of describing their doings. So we must perforce content ourselves with particularising the more noteworthy achievements of Sir Hubert Parry's young people, while complimenting the esteemed Director and his able staff on the exhilarating energy and enthusiasm of which these many concerts and the average excellence of the performances are the result. On June 24 Mr. R. H. Walthew's very charming Trio in C minor for violin, clarinet, and pianoforte was played with much care and considerable effect by William Read, Arthur Leonard, and Florence Smith, and the other concerted piece, Beethoven's String Quartet in G (Op. 18, No. 2), by Haydn Wood, Tom Morris, E. Behr, and E. Mason, with commendable finish and, especially as regards the Scherzo, delightful spirit and rhythmic accuracy. Harold Samuel gave us an impression of latent powers in his performance of Chopin's Polonaise in F sharp minor (Op. 44). It was somewhat rough, but inspiriting. Frank Cooter attempted Leporello's rarely sung air, "Per questa bella mano," from Mozart's "Don Giovanni." He has a ponderous bass voice that requires yet a great deal of training before his singing can prove acceptable. Eleanor Jones seemed a little overweighted in Schubert's "Young Nun." Her sympathetic voice was affected by a tremolo (due, perhaps, to over-study), which we would adjure her to strive with all her might to overcome. She has a true singer's temperament, but a tremolo would annul even such a great natural advantage.

The following concert, on the 6th ult., took place at St. James's Hall, and was orchestral. The programme opened with Mr. Hamish MacCunn's clever Orchestral Ballad "Ship o' the Fiend" and closed with Dvořák's fresh and beautiful Fourth Symphony in G (Op. 88), both of which were played with spirit and expression. Professor Stanford took the delicious Allegro grazioso in the symphony slightly faster than the composer, and imparted to it an amount of passion and striving which put quite a new complexion on the music. The peculiar, puzzling Adagio gives us still the impression of hiding a secret programme. Would that the great composer himself enlightened us! William Read played the solo part in Ed. Lalo's "Symphonie Espagnole" for violin and orchestra, with highly developed technique, good tone, and considerable expression, while Herbert Fryer was privileged to produce, for the first time in England—unless we are much mistaken—Tschaïkowsky's Fantasia in G for pianoforte and orchestra (Op. 56), one of those brilliant, tuneful, bizarre, and, in places, utterly undignified effusions of which the Russians have given us all too many. It is extremely difficult and requires the most brilliant playing, and more especially the greatest sonority and aplomb in the many passages in chords, to make its proper effect. Herbert Fryer seemed to lack the physical strength required to do full justice to the music, but he played with fluency and spirit. Eleanor Jones sang the touching air, "Ah me, my heart is heavy," from Berlioz's "Faust," very feelingly. She has "tears in her voice," a priceless gift that will stand her in good stead whenever she sings in public. Hilda Foster sang Mozart's "Voi che sapete" with her wonted refinement, and Ivor Foster was impressive in Wagner's "O star of Eve." The orchestra was at its best, a special word of praise being due for the excellent manner in which the accompaniments to the solos were played.

At the following concert, on the 8th ult., some two dozen pupils appeared in no less than eighteen pieces. We were glad to see the names of four English composers in the programme—viz., Battison Haynes (three songs), Sullivan ("Where the bee sucks"), Edward Elgar (vocal trio, "The Snow"), and R. H. Walthew (song, "My beloved"). Beyond this and the statement that four pupils produced a new and pleasing Quartettino for four violoncellos, by Signor Piatti, it is impossible to notice this Brobdignagian programme.

Great interest was given to the concert on the 15th by the production of a String Quartet in G minor by a student, Nicholas Gatty, an exceedingly creditable piece of work, which will excite much interest in his future compositions. The first movement, indeed, though interesting and well-written, lacks the strength that should characterise an opening Allegro, and the Andante is perhaps not more than pleasing; but in the Scherzo we find traces of some originality, and some exceedingly clever variations on a simple old Worcestershire air display much skill and taste, and form a very satisfactory close to a very promising work.

The author was called for and very warmly applauded—hearty applause being given also to the executants, William Read, Gertrude Lester, Edward Behr, and Robert Grimson. In Emile Bernard's Suite for violin and pianoforte, Beatrice La Palme showed herself a most skilful performer on her instrument, but her tone was not always quite powerful enough to compete with the pianoforte, under the hands of Gertrude Wortley. Dvorák's great Quintet in A has often been played at the College, and we need not now say more than to commend the performance of Marjorie Richardson, Margaret Wishart, Marion Scott, Edward Behr, and R. Purcell Jones. Cicely Gleeson White may be complimented on her beautiful singing of Wagner's "Der Engel" and "Träume," and Emma Atherden did justice to Goring Thomas's setting of the familiar "Know'st thou the land?" Rhoda Whiley and Maud Turner gave a very pleasing rendering of two pretty duets by Rubinstein.

The last concert of the term, on the 22nd ult., was orchestral as usual, and commenced with Schumann's very rarely heard, and not undeservedly neglected Overture to Schiller's drama "Die Braut von Messina" (Op. 100). The symphony was Hermann Goetz's very German, but very beautiful Symphony in F, which has not yet lost a particle of its freshness and poetry. It is still one of the most enjoyable of modern symphonies. The performance was spirited and effective, though somewhat lacking in refinement. R. Purcell Jones played Dvorák's Violoncello Concerto (Op. 104) and made light of its formidable difficulties. He is a most able performer on his difficult instrument, combining a brilliant technique with genuine musical feeling. A. McDonald Davy and Mathilde Abeniacar sang Mozart's "Qui sdegno" and Gounod's "Jewel Song" ("Faust") respectively, with considerable success.

GUILDHALL SCHOOL OF MUSIC.

Extension.

No better proof of the steadily increasing growth of the taste for music in this country during the last quarter of the century could be offered than the continuous progress of the Guildhall School. Under the late Weist Hill it started in September, 1880, with 62 pupils; but by the end of the year this number had become 216, with 29 professors. Five years later arose the necessity for removal from the altogether inadequate quarters in Aldermanbury and the erection of the building on the Victoria Embankment, in which the experience and judgment of Sir Joseph Barnby led to such good results. Once more the gradual augmentation of the pupils exceeded the accommodation provided, and there are now no less than 3,650 students participating in the advantages of the Institution. Further land was acquired for the erection of an annexe, including a theatre, and the extended premises were opened with sufficient ceremony by the Lord Mayor on the 11th ult. The students' orchestra played in good style a bright and effective Festal March, composed for the occasion by the Principal, Mr. W. H. Cummings. To this succeeded the same composer's chorus "Domine dirige nos," a sympathetic rendering by Miss Maude Elliot (an exhibitioner) of "O rest in the Lord," Barnby's refined part-song "Sweet and low" (admirably given by the choir), the tenor air from "Creation," "In native worth," neatly sung by Mr. Frank Tebbutt (another exhibitioner), and Bishop's serenade "O, by rivers," performed by orchestra and choir. Addresses by the Lord Mayor and others followed. During a short speech, Mr. W. H. Cummings said the establishment was a recognition of the fact that music was not merely a pastime, but an important factor in the education of the country. They were educating not only professionals, but appreciative listeners to good music. Besides declaring the building open, the Lord Mayor presented Miss Maude Clough with the silver medal accompanying the Jubilee challenge cup presented to the school by Sir Stuart Knill. The only detail of the additions to which exception was taken was the very small depth of the stage, although this fault is to be partially remedied by the addition of a few more feet in front of the proscenium. With the fresh means at disposal, the Guildhall School will next term commence a new chapter in its eventful history.

TONIC SOL-FA CHORAL FESTIVAL.

The fourteenth choral festival of the Tonic Sol-fa Association was successfully held at the Crystal Palace on the 16th ult. Convincing testimony to the ability of a juvenile choir numbering five thousand voices and to an adult force of singers totalling three thousand was afforded at concerts respectively given in the afternoon and evening on the Handel orchestra. All who took part in the first programme held the junior certificate of the Tonic Sol-fa College, and throughout Mr. S. Filmer Rook, the conductor, had no difficulty in keeping his multitude together. The attack was for the most part good, the attention to light and shade was creditable, and there could be no doubt of the zeal animating the youthful vocalists. Franz Abt's trio "Softly slumbering" and E. Markham Lee's "Dance, ye merry wavelets," particularly yielded satisfactory evidence of the care bestowed in the preparation of the part-songs. Of a higher class was the adult concert presided over by Mr. Leonard C. Venables, with orchestral accompaniment, and Mr. Henry W. Weston at the organ. The place of honour was occupied by a liberal selection from Handel's "Alexander's Feast," a work that should be more frequently performed by choral societies. Those worthy examples of the composer's genius, "The many rend the skies," "The Princes applaud," "At last, divine Cecilia," and other numbers, made such a deep impression on the listeners as to create the belief that further supplies from similar sources would be acceptable another year. The pieces named were steadily rendered and there was a laudable attempt in the direction of dramatic expression, the performances throughout showing a great advance upon preceding festivals. Many of the vocalists at this concert came from the provinces. Among other specially attractive features were "The choosing of the Queen" and "The Hunt's Up," from Macfarren's thoroughly English cantata "May Day," and John Dowland's "Come again, sweet love."

LONDON SCHOOL BOARD VOCAL MUSIC DISPLAY.

The annual display of vocal music by children from London Board Schools was held in the Queen's Hall on June 29. The custom hitherto at these interesting gatherings has been for schools to compete for the possession of a challenge medallion; but on this occasion the competitive element was abandoned, and the various choirs sang with no other stimulus to exceptional efficiency than was afforded by the presence of a large audience, including the Chairman of the Board, Lord Reay (who was accompanied by many of the most important members of the Board), and the knowledge that Sir John Stainer and Dr. McNaught had been specially requested to attend and publicly report upon the singing. The result of the demonstration was certainly highly satisfactory. This can be freely admitted without necessarily decrying the utility of choral competitions, which in the past have rendered immense service to school choirs and adult choirs in all parts of the country. Of course, the object to be attained by competitions is the establishment of high ideals of execution and a diffusion of the knowledge of the means by which these ideals can be realised. If, under favourable circumstances, as in the present instance, these aims can be attained without competition, certainly no harm to the cause of progress can result. The demonstration on this occasion included the performance of glees and part-songs by choirs from Great College Street School (conductor, Mr. T. Casserley), Morrow Road School (Miss A. S. Frisby), Lauriston Road School (Mr. W. R. Emerson), Kilburn Lane School (Mr. W. T. Oke), and Hazelrigge Road School (Mr. W. T. Stuart). The choirs sang separately and also united in singing several pieces. Of the separate performances we hope we may be allowed to say that the Haselrigge Road Choir showed especial skill in delicate expression and sweet tone, and the Morrow Road girls sang with commendable daintiness. The great control of the conductors of the Lauriston Road and Kilburn Lane Choirs over their forces was very obvious. The children were responsive to every slight gesture and sang with delightful expression. Of the pieces sung unitedly, under the direction of Mr. A. L. Cowley, the three-part arrangement of Stainer's well-known anthem "Ye shall dwell in the land" was, perhaps, the most beautifully performed. The Crawford Street Infants Choir contributed some action songs, and the entertainment was still further varied by the performance of a string band—plus a cornet, played by a very small boy—from Roman Road School, Bow, and an elaborately prepared costume-recital of a selection from an operetta entitled "Columbus in a Merry Key" (Edwards and C. T. West), under Mr. C. J. Bush. The latter piece was hardly so successful as the others, but it very well served to illustrate the astonishing care often expended upon operettas given in Board and other elementary schools. The most interesting part of the proceedings to musicians was the demonstration of sight singing. A trio, by Sir John Stainer, "Now the golden morn," was sung from the tonic sol-fa notation by the 300 children, on the whole, with admirable correctness, an occasional unsteadiness of time and misreading of some "octave marks" being the only faults. Another trio, specially composed by Dr. Turpin, was sung quite accurately from the staff notation. Such a demonstration of sight singing power from the ordinary notation should go some way to allay the apprehensions of some musicians that School Board singing leads nowhere. A further and striking illustration of the utility and efficiency of the method employed by the schools was the "telling by ear" of the notes of a short simple trio written by Dr. McNaught. The parts were separately played on the organ, and were rapidly written by each child on paper, and at the conclusion the three parts were sung from the copies so written. Some of our readers may be glad to know that all the foregoing tests were given in full with the July number of the School Music Review. At the conclusion of the musical proceedings Lord Reay assumed the chair and spoke of the valuable musical results secured without special machinery, without additional expenditure, and through the usual routine of the schools. The following report, which had been drawn up by Sir John Stainer and Dr. McNaught, was read to the meeting:

"The choral performances were marked by great thoroughness of preparation, and were generally excellent in every way. In previous years the greatest fault in the singing of the various choirs was a tendency to get flat. Although this fault was not entirely eradicated in to-day's demonstration, we are glad to record that the singing generally was distinguished by good intonation. As to the highly important matter of voice production, we are glad to observe that all the choirs had given attention to the matter. In some cases the singing was surprisingly good in every particular—in artistic execution, beautiful tone and blend, and unity of attack. The pieces sung by the united choirs were also prepared with great pains. The sight singing and exhibition of ear training were remarkable evidences not only of the natural capacity of the children, but of the skill of their enthusiastic teachers. We are glad to remark that a school band played some selections. It is very desirable to offer every possible encouragement to the formation of school bands of the orchestral type. We should like to add that the performance to-day gives clear evidence of the excellent musical work being carried out by the School Board. We are gratified to find that much of the music being studied is calculated to improve the taste of the children as well as to cultivate their practical skill."

LONDON SUNDAY SCHOOL CHOIR.

With increasing years the oldest association of its particular kind does not relax in spirit. Others are now working in virtually the same field, but the London Sunday School Choir keeps well to the front, both as regards festival selections and the manner in which they are rendered. In neither respect could fault be found with the twenty-sixth annual gathering at the Crystal Palace on the 13th ult. As usual, the chief musical events were the two concerts by choirs testing the capacity of the Handel Orchestra. First came five thousand children with a series of pieces, sacred and secular, given under the direction of Mr. J. Rowley, whilst Mr. W. F. Freeman presided at the organ. The programme included some amusing "action songs," gone through with a vigour and spontaneity evidently as enjoyable to the singers as to the audience. At the subsequent concert by the choir of four thousand selected voices, the Crystal Palace and London Sunday School Orchestras assisted both with accompaniments and with able performances on their own account. The organist was Mr. Horace G. Holmes. Dr. Garrett's thanksgiving anthem, "The Lord is loving unto every man," Barnby's "The Valleys and the Mountains," "See what Love" ("St. Paul"), Sullivan's anthem, "Hearken unto Me, My people," J. H. Maunder's harvest anthem, "Praise the Lord, O Jerusalem," and "Achieved is the glorious work" ("Creation") were sung with imposing effect, taste and power being manifested in corresponding degree. In the secular section were Pinsuti's "Good-night, Beloved," Stewart's always popular "The Bells of St. Michael's Tower," and Pierson's setting of "Ye Mariners of England." The two last-named were given with admirable swing and point. The programme further contained the American "Song of Peace" (an arrangement of the Anvil Chorus from "Il Trovatore"), given at the National Peace Festival at Boston in 1869, and W. W. Pearson's whimsical "Three Doughtie Men." Owing to the illness of Mr. George Merritt, the accompanied pieces were conducted by Mr. David M. Davis (the conductor of the Sunday School Orchestra), and Mr. W. P. Hunter (the deputy-conductor of the choir) took the baton for the unaccompanied pieces.

CHOIR BENEVOLENT FUND.

A very successful festival in aid of the Choir Benevolent Fund was held at Windsor on the 12th ult., which comprised an afternoon service in St. George's Chapel and an evening concert at the Albert Institute. The music on both occasions was performed by a choir of upwards of sixty voices, selected from St. George's Chapel, St. Paul's Cathedral, Westminster Abbey, the Chapels Royal, and Eton College choirs.

A procession was formed in the East aisle of the Chapel, and, headed by the secretary of the Fund (Mr. W. A. Frost, of St. Paul's), proceeded down the North aisle and up the centre of the nave singing (unaccompanied) the hymn "Hark, the sound of holy voices," to Mr. Langran's tune "Deerhurst." Having arrived at some temporary seats erected for them in the nave, the choirs sang (also unaccompanied) Croft's "Cry aloud and shout." Evening Prayer followed, with special Psalms to chants by Crotch in C, Sir George Martin in A flat, and Sir Joseph Barnby in D flat. The Canticles were sung (unaccompanied) to Stephen Elvey's setting in A, and after the third Collect came Sir Frederick Bridge's anthem "It is a good thing to give thanks," conducted by the composer and accompanied by Dr. C. H. Lloyd, organist of Eton College. At the close of Evening Prayer, "Hosanna," by Orlando Gibbons, was sung unaccompanied. A collection was then made while a voluntary was being played by Mr. H. E. Carver. "Praise the Lord," by Sir John Goss, then followed, accompanied by Dr. Lloyd; and the Blessing, with the Sevenfold Amen and one verse of "God save the Queen" brought a most interesting and effective service to a conclusion. With the exception of Sir Frederick Bridge's anthem, the whole of the music was conducted by Sir Walter Parratt, organist of St. George's Chapel and Master of the Queen's music.

The concert programme included four madrigals (also conducted by Sir Walter Parratt)—viz., "Sweet honey-sucking bees" (Wilbye), "Light of my soul" (Pearsall), "The silver swan" (Orlando Gibbons), and "In these delightful pleasant groves" (Purcell); two part-songs for men's voices—viz., "Bold Turpin," conducted by its composer, Sir Frederick Bridge (and re-demanded with great enthusiasm), and "The Pedlar," by Mr. Lee Williams; and four glees—viz., "Queen of the valley" (Callcott), "Wanton Gales" (Webbe), "The cloud-capp'd towers" (Stevens), and "Father of heroes" (Callcott). Songs were contributed by Master Percy Wood (Westminster), Mr. Gawthrop (Chapels Royal), Mr. Bertram Mills and Master F. E. Ball (Windsor), and Messrs. H. Stubbs and De Lacy (St. Paul's). A pianoforte duet was played by Sir Walter Parratt and Dr. Lloyd, and two trios for trebles—"The Nights," by Roberti, and "O'er the starlit waters," by Campana—were most effectively sung by nine Westminster choristers. With regard to the financial results, it may be mentioned that the indefatigable local secretary, the Rev. S. K. Tahourdin, and Mr. T. Hunt, the local correspondent, received upwards of sixty pounds in donations; that the offertory amounted to over twenty-four pounds, and that the sale of concert tickets exceeded forty pounds.

Between the rehearsals and the service the choirs lunched together at the Castle Hotel, the Dean of Windsor occupying the chair, when speeches were made by the Dean, Mr. W. A. Frost, Sir Frederick Bridge, Sir Walter Parratt, and the Rev. S. K. Tahourdin, all of whom were received with great enthusiasm. Altogether the Society may be congratulated upon having had a festival which was an unqualified success, both from a musical and a financial point of view.

THE HOVINGHAM MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

The Hovingham Musical Festival has always been an institution of remarkable ambition, but this year it has surpassed itself. For a village of a few hundred inhabitants to give a two days' festival, at which Brahms's "German Requiem" should be in the programme and Dr. Joachim and Mr. Leonard Borwick among the performers, is probably without precedent. Canon Hudson, who has now organised and conducted eight of these festivals, has never shown either his ability or his influence in a stronger light than at the meeting which took place on June 28 and 29. The performances of the choral works, including Professor Stanford's "Revenge" and a portion of the "Creation," showed a distinct advance on the part of the choir, recruited as usual from various centres in the North and West Ridings. To tackle so extremely exacting a work as the "German Requiem" showed the pluck of all concerned, from the conductor downwards. Their reward was a performance of great all-round excellence, in which only a shade more brightness in parts was wanting to make it completely satisfying. The steadiness of the chorus-singing was admirable, and in this respect much was due to a number of Leeds singers, who, at the Parish Church and elsewhere, had become thoroughly familiar with Brahms's music. The solos were well sung by Miss Agnes Nicholls, whose reading of the soprano air was marked by genuine feeling and expressive power, and Mr. Francis Harford.

"The Revenge" was particularly successful, being sung with a spirit and point that satisfied even the composer, who was in the audience. The "Unfinished" Symphony of Schubert, among other orchestral works, showed Canon Hudson's prowess as a conductor, and especially his power of impressing his ideas on the players. Mr. Leonard Borwick, who is no stranger to these festivals, played the Mozart Concerto he recently introduced at a Lamoureux concert, and a Concertstück by Schumann (Op. 92), with his usual perfect clearness and unerring taste, and the principal vocalists, Miss Agnes Nicholls, Mrs. Burrell, Mr. F. Harford, and Mr. Plunket Greene, one and all contributed to the excellence of the performances. But the great feature of the festival was the appearance of Dr. Joachim. It was not merely that he played the Bach Chaconne, the Beethoven Concerto, and the double Concerto of Bach (with Mr. Kruse), with his usual perfect intellectual mastery and sympathy. Nor was it even the singularity of his appearance at a village festival, as a mark of esteem for one of our ablest amateurs, though this lent an undeniable piquancy to the occurrence. What gave the event its unique character was the coincidence that the first day of the festival fell on the great violinist's birthday, so that the event became in great measure a celebration of a personal and intimate character. To mark it worthily, it had been determined to give to Dr. Joachim, on behalf of performers and hearers alike, a birthday present. A subscription was levied, and never were contributions made with greater readiness and goodwill than those which were sent for one whom all musicians delight to honour. A silver bowl and a silver loving-cup, both simple, massive, and after antique precedents, were purchased, and were formally given to Dr. Joachim, during the concert on June 28, by Sir William Worsley, the president of the festival, by whose favour it is held in Hovingham Hall. The inscription on each read thus: "To Joseph Joachim, in heart-felt appreciation of his vast services to music. Presented with feelings of sincerest gratitude and respect, by friends interested and taking part in the Hovingham Musical Festival, on his birthday, June 28, MDCCCXCVIII." The style of lettering was copied from the engraved title page of the first published score of "Alexander's Feast," which appeared in 1738. Nor was this the only tribute. A "Birthday Ode" was written by Dr. Purey-Cust, the Dean of York, and the last stanza was set for contralto solo, chorus, and orchestra, by Mr. Tertius Noble, the organist of York Minster, who conducted it. The Dean's verse read as follows:—

> Hail! honoured guest, may God upon thy head
> His chiefest blessings bountifully shed,
> Cheer thee with memories of triumphs won,
> Of talents nobly used, of kindness done,
> Preserve thy still unwearied brilliant powers,
> Through many future happy days and hours,
> Enrich each passing year with peace and rest,
> And grant thee life eternal with the blest.

Mr. Noble's music is not only gracefully appropriate, but serious and lofty in style, while thoroughly melodious and genial. Its intrinsic merits were such that one regretted its subject made it necessarily of an ephemeral nature. A happy touch was the appearance in the score of a phrase of "Hoch soll er leben"—the Teutonic counterpart of "For he's a jolly good fellow"—which was given out lustily by the horns and trombones, while the chorus sang the opening greeting, "Hail! honoured guest." The contralto solo in the "Greeting," was most artistically sung by Mrs. Burrell, and the performance was as smooth as it was hearty.

The three concerts were well attended, and Canon Hudson's surprisingly successful appeal to the ladies present to remove their headgear added to the comfort of the audience and furnished a valuable precedent for future use. Among those present were Professor and Mrs. Stanford, Miss Fanny Davies, Mr. Henry Bird, and a great nephew of Mendelssohn, Mr. Robin Mendelssohn, of Berlin, who both listened and played the violoncello in the excellent orchestra led by Mr. Rendle, and including many well known London artists. Not the least important factor in the great success of the event was the weather, the two days of the festival being perfect in this respect, though rain and cold wind came both before and after.

CHOIR FESTIVAL IN RIPON CATHEDRAL.

Every year a choir festival is held in one of the three northern Cathedrals of York, Durham, and Ripon. The choirs of these Cathedrals, together with that of the more recently formed Cathedral of Wakefield, form the nucleus of the chorus, which is largely augmented by choirs from the various parish churches in the several dioceses, for whom the festival service is supposed to serve as an object lesson. Without doubt it does tend to raise the standard of Church music in the Northern province.

This year's meeting took place at Ripon, on the 13th ult. The number of choirs taking part was smaller than usual, the only additions to the four Cathedral bodies being from parishes in Wakefield and Bradford, together with Dr. Crow's own Ripon Society and a choir of ladies from Harrogate. On this occasion they were accompanied not only by the Cathedral organ, but by a small band of strings, an innovation which certainly gave additional interest to the performances. It also permitted the introduction of an organ concerto, a little heard work by Handel. This was the "Posthumous" one in F, the fourteenth and latest in order of publication, which was written in 1735, but did not appear till after the composer's death in 1797, in Arnold's great edition of Handel's works. It was ably played by Dr. Crow, the Ripon organist, and conducted by Dr. Armes, of Durham, and proved highly interesting, though the performance would have been nearer perfection had it been possible for the organist to be more in touch with the conductor and orchestra down below. The acoustic difficulties of the situation militated in a much smaller degree against the choral music, the chief feature of which was Mendelssohn's setting of the 42nd

Psalm, "As the hart pants," which was very well sung, the solos being taken by members of the Cathedral choirs. The Cantate and Deus Misereatur were sung to a setting by Dr. Crow, in G, well suited for a large body of voices, being broad, tuneful, and easily understood, while the strings had plenty of opportunities afforded them. Not the least admirable features of the service, from a musical point of view, were two capital hymn tunes by Professor Armes. "Hail, festal day," is well known at these gatherings, and a fellow to it was provided in a swinging and original tune to Lyte's "Praise, my soul, the King of Heaven." Dr. Armes has certainly the happy knack of writing a tune that is thoroughly musicianly, yet "popular," in the best sense of the word, being devoid of both the sentimentality and the vulgarity that are the bane of so many modern hymn tunes. Mr. Noble, the York organist, appeared in the service paper in the modest capacity of the composer of a double chant, but also shared with the other Cathedral organists the task of accompanying the service. It was to be regretted that both the congregation and the number of choirs participating seemed to fall considerably below the average, for the good done by the festival largely depends upon the extent of the interest excited by it.

THANKSGIVING SERVICE IN SALISBURY CATHEDRAL.

On the 11th ult. a special service was held in Salisbury Cathedral to celebrate the completion of the important and difficult work of carrying out the repairs which were found to be necessary, just three years ago, in order to ensure the preservation of the tower and spire. A vast and representative congregation assembled in the sacred edifice, and the service was in every way worthy of the impressive occasion.

Shortly before three o'clock an imposing civic and masonic procession entered the Cathedral to the strains of the National Anthem, played by the organist, Mr. C. F. South. The city choirs, preceded by their banners, and the diocesan clergy, followed down the centre aisle, while the organist played Wesley's Andante in G. Precisely at three o'clock the Bishop of Salisbury and the members of the Cathedral body and choir proceeded from the vestry to the West door to receive the Archbishop of Canterbury, who was accompanied by the Bishops of Bath and Wells, Bristol, Southwark, and Marlborough, Bishop Corfe and Bishop Mylne. The processional hymn, "All people that on earth do dwell," accompanied by the band of the First Wilts Rifle Volunteers, was sung in unison with thrilling effect by the whole of the congregation and choirs. In the Glorias to the Proper Psalms the brass instruments were again brought into requisition. The Magnificat and Nunc dimittis were sung to Henry Smart's beautiful setting in B flat, and the anthem chosen for the occasion was Sir John Stainer's "I saw the Lord sitting upon a throne." The rendering of the latter was extremely fine, the introduction of the band, especially at the passage "And the house was filled with smoke," being wonderfully effective. The verse "O Trinity! O Unity!" was sung by the members of the Cathedral choir. Dr. Temple preached an eloquent and appropriate sermon; and after the offertory had been taken Smart's Te Deum in F was rendered as a solemn act of thanksgiving, the Archbishop standing before the altar holding his primatial cross, with the other prelates on either side of him.

Special congratulations are due to the Precentor of the Cathedral, Rev. H. W. Carpenter, upon the admirable arrangements for the service generally, and especially the musical portions, which he successfully conducted. The body of singers under his control was sufficiently powerful, without being, as is sometimes the case on such occasions, unwieldy. The whole of the music had been judiciously chosen, the selection of hymns being particularly happy. That the work of Mr. South, the talented Cathedral organist, was well done goes without saying; his finely played accompaniments were the subject of general remark. A word of praise must also be given to the bandmaster (Mr. Charles Fanner) and members of the First Wilts Rifle Volunteer Band, who so effectively reinforced the organ in certain parts of the service.

"KING OLAF" IN AUSTRALIA.

A brilliant success.

If King Olaf himself—who, we believe, was never known to "cross the line"—had appeared at the Masonic Hall, Ascot Vale, Melbourne, on May 19, he could not have met with a more enthusiastic reception than that accorded to the cantata named after him and duly performed at the above place on that date. All praise and honour to the North Suburban Choral Union for having been the channel whereby Mr. Edward Elgar's fine work was introduced to the Antipodes. The local newspapers are loud in their praises of the success of the work and the impression it made on the audience, which included His Excellency Sir John Madden, Lady Madden, and Miss Madden. "Notwithstanding the fact," says a local report, "that the concert happened on the first evening of steady rain experienced this winter (!) there was a very large attendance, the hall being completely filled. Additional brilliancy was conferred on the concert by the attendance of the vice-regal party. The hall and platform were handsomely decorated with flags and other devices, the platform being margined with an array of palms and other plants, while a beautiful arrangement in white flowers, representing a harp, appropriately ornamented the conductor's stand."

In regard to the performance the same journal remarks: "This work, strikingly original in design and treatment, fully bore out the forecasting description published in our last issue. It is clear that the composer was quite untrammelled by consideration of the requirements of amateur performers; in fact, a glance at the score would suggest that he had written over the heads of any amateur organisation. Thus all the more credit is due to the hon. conductor of the Society for the sterling representation they gave."

The soloists were Miss Nellie McClelland (soprano), Mr. Horatio F. Dickson (tenor), and Mr. Horace Stevens (bass). The excellent honorary conductor of the Society, Mr. E. A. Jaeger, deserves the heartiest congratulations upon the success attending the performance and the way in which he directed his combined forces of orchestra (augmented for the occasion) and chorus. "The production of such a magnificent work for the first time in Australia by the North Suburban Choral Union is a most creditable achievement, and the triumph of the well-known conductor is shared in by both choir and orchestra. The work involved in bringing out such a composition must have been enormous, and the all-round efficiency displayed cannot be too highly praised." At the conclusion of the concert Mr. J. F. McCarron, the president of the Society, entertained Sir John Madden, who, in responding to the toast of his health, said he felt a peculiar pleasure in being present that evening "at the production of a beautiful musical work, magnificently rendered by the Society."

Some idea of the genuine enthusiasm aroused by the performance of Mr. Elgar's work may be gathered from the following letter, written to one of the local papers à propos of the event:—

"I venture to ask for space to urge on the Committee of the North Suburban Choral Union the desirability of repeating the Society's fine performance of Elgar's magnificent work 'King Olaf.' I feel sure that all the musical people in the district will join in congratulating the conductor and the members of the Society on the devotion to art shown by their undertaking to carry to so successful an issue the performance of so difficult a composition. When we consider that it is the work of a young English genius whose name may yet be one of those who are to remove the reproach from Britons that the best music is 'made in Germany,' and further, bearing in mind the prestige that attaches to this district by the fact that a local society should be the first to produce a work which is now occupying the interest of the musical world in the old country, it seems a pity that the performance should be limited to subscribers and their friends. My proposal is that the work should be repeated with a charge for admission of one shilling, so that no music-lover need be prevented from hearing this unique and characteristic composition."

"Unique and characteristic composition" is good. Advance, Australia!

THE BERGEN FESTIVAL.

It was a happy idea on the part of Edvard Grieg, himself a native of Bergen, to organise, with the aid of a very competent committee, a festival of Norwegian music in connection with the International Fisheries Exhibition now going forward in that town. Not only was such an undertaking calculated to gratify his countrymen generally and encourage native musicians, but to the numerous foreigners visiting the country at this time it afforded an exceptional opportunity of fully appreciating the high standard which Norwegian music has attained in the present day. As a matter of fact, the festival, which took place from June 26 to the 2nd ult., proved a complete success, the concert hall, specially erected for the occasion and capable of accommodating some 2,500 persons, being well filled at each of the seven concerts comprising the scheme by a most enthusiastic audience. There was a mixed choir of some four hundred voices, while the orchestra—the only non-national element in the proceedings—was the excellent one of the Concertgebouw, of Amsterdam, under the direction of M. Willem Mengelberg. Amongst the works which had been given a place in the respective programmes, it must suffice to enumerate the principal ones. These were: the Pianoforte Concerto in A minor, the scenes from "Olav Trygvason," and several songs, by Grieg; the "Norse Rhapsody" for orchestra, in C, an orchestral legend "Zorahayda," and the Symphony in D, by Johann Svendsen; a new Pianoforte Concerto in D flat, by Christian Sinding; an orchestral suite from the incidental music to Goethe's "Götz von Berlichingen," by Iver Holter; a symphonic poem, "Asgaardsreien," by Ole Olsen; an orchestral suite by G. Schjelderup; Halvorsen's "Vasentasena"; pieces by C. Elling and Madame Grøndahl; and songs by Capellen, Nordraak, Kjerulf, and others. Mesdames Backer-Grøndahl and Lie-Nissen were the highly efficient pianists, and the principal solo vocalists were Mesdames Gulbranson and Gmür-Harloff, and Herr Lammers. The composers, in most instances, conducted their own works. It is probable that the present highly satisfactory experience may lead to the institution of a periodically recurring national musical festival to be held in leading towns of Norway.

REVIEWS.

Andante with Variations and Allegro in B flat (Posthumous). For the Organ. By F. Mendelssohn-Bartholdy. [Novello and Company, Limited.]

It is an interesting fact that Mendelssohn wrote his six organ sonatas on the initiative of some English organists, with the result that an English publisher commissioned him to compose this classic of the organ. In a letter to his publisher, written in English and dated "Frankfort, December 17, 1844," Mendelssohn says: "I hope to send you soon the promised organ pieces. Nine are ready, but I want to have twelve before I make a parcel of them." The two pieces forming the present publication have been selected from those that remained unpublished of the "parcel" referred to by the composer. They are now printed for the first time from the original manuscripts preserved in the Royal Library at Berlin.

The theme of the Andante begins:

In the first variation the melody is played in the lower octave by the left hand while a counterpoint in quavers floats above it. This is followed by a triplet accompaniment to the theme, which gives place to a diapason movement containing some effective holding notes against the air in an inner part. Pleasant variety is afforded by the succeeding section, a genial movement in six-eight time, containing some imitative matter of an almost conversational character. The tune is again introduced in its unadorned form and the movement peacefully concludes like the fading light of the dying day. This specimen of Mendelssohn's organ music in his tenderest mood will, we doubt not, find many interpreters, its simplicity and melodiousness being a marked feature no less than a strong recommendation. The Allegro in B flat is in strong contrast to the preceding. Here we have a series of massive chords constructed in this form:

which accompany the melody, wherever it appears, throughout. Played at the requisite speed and with the vigour that it demands, the effectiveness of the movement would be beyond dispute. As recital pieces, and in the services of the Church, these posthumous organ compositions of Mendelssohn will doubtless find general acceptance amongst the players of the same master's "Six Sonatas" and the "Three Preludes and Fugues."

What is good Music? By W. J. Henderson. [John Murray.]

About two years ago Sir Arthur Sullivan delivered an important address on "Music" at the Midland Institute, Birmingham, in the course of which he made a strong appeal for the better education of listeners to music. The intelligent appreciation of music is a far too neglected feature of musical education. Much of the time absolutely wasted on technique, which may never produce adequate results, might be more profitably devoted to stimulating a pupil's imagination and understanding in things pertaining to music. The book before us, written by a distinguished musical critic in New York, is on the lines indicated above. "If," says our author, "I venture to offer a few hints to those who find pleasure in listening to music, but desire to make that pleasure dependent not on fancy but on judgment, I may hope that not every man will deem me an impertinent fellow." By no means will that be the case. This little book of nearly 200 pages is crowded with observations as pertinent to the subject as they are wise in judgment. Subject to a "Prelude," the book is divided into two main sections: (1) "The qualities of good music," (2) "The performance of music." These are sub-divided into "The essentials of form," "Vocal forms," "The content of music," "The sensuous, the intellectual, the emotional, and the æsthetics of music"; and in regard to the performance of music (the smaller section of the book), the orchestra, chamber music, the pianoforte, the violin, the work of a chorus, and solo singing. The comprehensiveness of the ground covered by Mr. Henderson is obvious. The book is literally full of suggestive thoughts worthy of quotation. Here are some samples: "The first law of musical æsthetics is that a composition must contain free beauty. The melodic ideas must in and of themselves be beautiful. . . . But free beauty, which appeals to an indefinable consciousness of vitality, is not enough. A work of art must appeal to the judgment, which is an intellectual power." "The conception of beauty, as Kant notes, belongs to man alone. The beasts do not share it with him. Now, music is wholly the creation of the human intellect. It has no model in Nature as painting and sculpture have. . . . It is the highest product of the imagination, and hence closer to free beauty than any other art. It proceeds out of the elements of our tripartite nature, sensation, reason, and emotion, in their most uncircumscribed and unconditioned state, and consequently it appeals to them with irresistible force." On the subject of emotion, Mr. Henderson says: "Without musical emotion that can be communicated to the hearer, the most exquisite touch in the world will have no effect. Temperament—temperament—is what we all cry for. What is temperament? It is hard to define, but easy to discern. . . . All we can say of it is that it is musical organization. It is the vital spark which lies in the soul of an artist to be fanned into luminous fire by the sound of his own music, so that the world may bask in the splendid glow. It is inspiration, for which poor, yearning, hungry aspiration is so often mistaken." But "the emotion of the artist must be controlled. It must be under the command of the will, which in its turn must be guided by the intellect. Music is a glorious ship upon the ocean of art; emotion is the breeze that fills the sails; intellect is the skilled hand at the wheel." The sub-title of the book, "Suggestions to persons desiring to cultivate a taste in musical art," has been admirably fulfilled in these thoughtful and well-written pages of an interesting contribution to the æsthetics of music.

A Rainbow of Peace. Harvest-tide Cantata. By Thomas Adams. [Novello and Company, Limited.]

Mr. Adams's cantata should meet with wide acceptance for it is admirably suited to the requirements of Harvest festivals. It opens with the popular hymn "Come, ye thankful people, come," as set by Sir George Elvey. This is followed, after a brief recitative for tenor, by a quartet and chorus, "The earth brought forth grass," the music being diatonic and vigorous. Another hymn, "God the Father whose creation," gives place to a tenor solo of melodious character, which is also succeeded by a chorus and the hymn "Lord, in Thy Name Thy servants plead." The remainder of the work consists of a bass solo and chorus of an effective nature, another tenor solo and chorus, and the hymns "We plough the fields and scatter" and "Now thank we all our God," which concludes a well designed and inspiriting work.

Novello's Collection of Words of Anthems. New and Enlarged Edition. With Appendix.
[Novello and Company, Limited.]

Since the issue of this invaluable book, nearly ten years ago, no less than 400 new anthems have appeared. This fact in itself would be sufficient justification for a new edition. Advantage has been taken of the reprint to greatly improve the book, especially is this the case in the index of "Anthems suitable for certain days or seasons." Some idea of the exhaustive character of this addition may be estimated when we state that it consists of sixty sub-headings, of which the "Harvest" section, for instance, contains upwards of 150 anthems. The other indexes are of the same completeness and include "Names of Composers, with a list of their anthems," "Anthems suitable to be sung without accompaniment," "Anthems for men's voices," "Anthems with Latin words," "Index of passages of Scripture" (occupying twelve pages, printed in double columns), "Index of Collects, prayers, &c.," and a "General Index" of first lines. The vastness of the literature of the anthem is demonstrated by the presence, in this book, of the words of 1,952 anthems, some of the passages having been set by several different composers. Apart from its use in Divine Service in cathedrals, collegiate chapels, and churches, this encyclopædia of the anthem—carefully and admirably compiled by one of Messrs. Novello's chief assistants—should find its way into the hands of organists, choirmasters, precentors, and the clergy as an indispensable book of reference. The "Appendix" may be obtained separately if desired.

Three Two-part Songs in Canon Form. For female voices, with pianoforte accompaniment. Scherzo. For the pianoforte. By Mary Shillington.
[Charles Woolhouse.]

The composer of these two-part songs is manifestly an accomplished musician, who has diligently cultivated gifts of no mean order. The poems set are Oldy's exquisite miniature "The Fly," Herrick's dainty lament "To Blossoms," and Kingsley's world familiar lines "Clear and cool." The first and third are set in canon in the unison, and the second in canon in the third below. The composer, however, moves easily and with grace in these self-imposed fetters, which seem to have exercised no restriction on the flow of the melody. Rendered as duets, or by a choir in two parts, they would prove interesting to their singers and pleasing to their listeners. The Scherzo is a bright and genial piece, of little difficulty, but full of life and spirit.

Novello's Parish Choir Book. Nos. 349, 351, 352, 354-356. [Novello and Company, Limited.]

Several numbers of more than usual value have recently been added to this useful series of music for the Church. No. 349 is an easy setting of the Nicene Creed by R. W. Crowe. The voice parts are chiefly in monotone, but at the passage beginning "Who for us men" they glide into simple four-part harmony with impressive effect. Similar treatment has been adopted for the words "Whose kingdom shall have no end" and for "The life of the world to come," and much musical interest pertains to the independent organ part. In No. 351 "The Plain-song of the Athanasian Creed" has been arranged for voices in unison with organ accompaniment by Sir John Stainer, and will be found one of the best of its kind. No. 352 is a re-issue of "The Order of the Holy Communion," harmonised on a monotone by B. St. J. B. Joule, the merits of which have been widely appreciated. Simplicity and impressiveness are happily combined in this setting with remarkable effectiveness. Sir Arthur Sullivan's popular music to the Rev. Baring-Gould's processional hymn "Onward, Christian Soldiers," is published in convenient form in No. 354, and will be found very useful. Nos. 355 and 356 are settings in F of the Holy Communion. The former is by Bruce Steane and possesses exceptional musical interest and completeness. Two settings are given for the Responses to the Commandments, and are intended to be used alternately, with the usual variation for the final Response. The Creed is set melodically, but the voices are in unison with free harmonised organ accompaniment. The passage beginning "Who for us men" is directed to be sung by "tenors and basses only"; these give place to treble voices at "And was incarnate," who in turn are succeeded by the basses, who relate the Crucifixion, the full choir entering again at "And the third day." The most solemn portion of the Creed is thus emphasised in a simple but impressive manner, and the words are throughout admirably accentuated. The Offertory Sentences chosen are "Lay not up for yourselves" and "Be merciful after Thy power," which are allied to effective four-part vocal music. An ancient plain-song intonation has been adopted for the Sursum Corda, and the Sanctus, Benedictus, and Agnus Dei are set in flowing and melodious four-part harmony. They are followed by a good tune for Conder's favourite hymn "Bread of heaven" and a harmonised version of the Lord's Prayer, which, it is suggested, should be sung unaccompanied. The Gloria in Excelsis is simply but vigorously treated, and the service is impressively concluded with a Sevenfold Amen, the parts of which possess equal melodic interest. The setting by J. W. Elliott (No. 356) also includes the Benedictus and Agnus Dei, but only one version is given for the Kyrie Eleison, and the Creed is principally harmonised in four vocal parts. The Sanctus and Gloria in Excelsis are both set in a manner that will give little trouble to an average choir, but the Benedictus and Agnus Dei, upon which much care has manifestly been spent, will require more practice for their adequate rendering, which, however, will be well repaid.

A Handbook of Examinations in Music. By Ernest A. Dicks. [Novello and Company, Limited.]

The prevalence of examinations in music has resulted in the publication of a large number of books specially designed to help the candidate in these ordeals; but it may unhesitatingly be said that Mr. Dicks's work is the most complete and valuable guide that has yet appeared. It contains 600 questions with answers, in theory, harmony, counterpoint, form, fugue, acoustics, musical history, organ construction, and choir training, and, what is of even still greater practical value, a large number of the actual papers set by various examining bodies, study of which will enable the student to gain an insight into the style of examination adopted by the several institutions. Only those who have successfully passed the tests imposed will probably be able to fully appreciate the excellence and far-sightedness of the "Hints for Preparation" which form the introduction to Mr. Dicks's compilation, but they should be carefully "read, marked, learned, and inwardly digested" by every candidate. Concerning the necessity of method it is truly said that "It is the prime requisite for the study of every branch of education; without it failure is certain, with it success may be assured." Attention is also drawn to the great importance of "the proper distribution of each subject over the whole period of preparation," and the definition of "cramming" as "a species of preparation which may be termed dishonest" is to be cordially endorsed. The too constant use of catechisms is also rightly condemned, and the danger pointed out of attempting "to do work in three months which should occupy six." There is also given a comprehensive exercise for memorising the number of semitones in the various intervals, and a sure method for discovering the dreaded consecutive fifths and octaves which creep so readily into early efforts. In short, the candidate who takes the "hints" conveyed in this introduction will enter the examination-room with a very fair chance of gaining the coveted distinction. The suggested text books are well selected, and, as a whole, decidedly present the best authorities on the various branches of the art. In this particular Mr. Dicks's book may be consulted by all who desire technical knowledge of music. To know the best books on any subject is a considerable step towards its mastery, and peculiarly is this so of such a progressive art as music.

The six hundred questions are divided into eight sections, are classified in a manner that exemplifies the advantages accruing from method, and a commendable feature of their character is that they include those rudimentary matters which everybody knows, but so few perfectly understand. The practical value of the questions is also much increased by their being based upon "papers which have from time to time been set at the various local examinations in music all over the country." In the second part, "model answers" are given to these questions, the descriptive adjective being fully justified. The question, "Are notes of smaller value than a demisemiquaver ever used?" might puzzle some candidates; but those who have once seen the word "hemidemisemiquaver" can never forget the answer. Another question over which an examinee might be excused for ruffling his hair—viz., "What is rhythm?" is admirably answered by "The symmetrical arrangement of music in regard to time and accent," and no less happy is the definition of syncopation as "A disturbance of the natural flow of the accent by displacing it from the strong to the weak beat of the bar."

Part 3 comprises a collection of "Miscellaneous Local Examination Papers," the first one being a preliminary examination paper for candidates in practical subjects, set by the Associated Board of the Royal Academy and the Royal College of Music. Other papers include those of Oxford, Cambridge, London, Dublin, and Durham Universities, the Royal College of Organists, Trinity College, and the Incorporated Society of Musicians. This section is by no means the least valuable part of the book, and the specimen examination papers here gathered together give an excellent idea of the character of the various grades to be passed at the various examining institutions. It is hardly necessary to add that the candidate who conscientiously works these papers will be greatly helped along the road which leads to success. Apart, however, from its special purpose, Mr. Dicks's book may be recommended to all earnest lovers of music, for it contains a mass of information that will add not a little to their knowledge and enjoyment of the art.

Incorporated Society of Musicians. Register of Members, 1898.

[London: General Office, 19, Berners Street.]

The Register of the members of the Incorporated Society of Musicians has hitherto been published in anything but a form conducive to its preservation. But a distinct improvement marks the present issue. It appears in octavo size, and as it is strongly bound it will be able to stand on one's shelves, being free from that chronic spinal weakness which characterised the previous publication. In addition to the names and addresses of all the members, the book gives full information respecting the Society, its bye-laws, the Orphanage, the Examinations, and the Monthly Journal. The summary of the "roll of membership" is said to include "61 Fellows, Members, and Associates of the Royal Academy of Music"; but there is no such distinction as Member of that Institution. The Register is a very useful book of reference.

MUSIC IN BIRMINGHAM.

By the sad and untimely death of Mrs. J. Redfern Mason, née Linda Morton, Birmingham loses one of its most accomplished pianists. Mrs. Mason received her first musical education from her aunt, Mrs. Reynolds. She afterwards went to Frankfort and became a pupil of the late Madame Schumann, under whose tuition she became an accomplished player. Mrs. Mason was also an able performer on the violin and an excellent linguist.

Mr. Yates Mander, who for the past ten years has so ably discharged the duties of organist at St. Philip's Church, has been appointed to a similar post at the Parish Church, Ryde, Isle of Wight. The organist's post in connection with the Handsworth Old Church will also be vacant in September through the retirement of Mr. George Halford, who is compelled to give up his appointment on account of pressure of work.

The band of Her Majesty's Royal Horse Guards (Blues), conducted by Mr. Charles Godfrey, gave two excellent concerts at the Edgbaston Botanical Gardens on Saturday afternoon and evening, June 25. The band, which numbered twenty-five performers, was extremely well balanced, the mellow tone-quality of the clarinets, cornets, and horns being conspicuous even in the loudest tutti passages. The programme included an excellent selection from Sullivan's ballet "Merrie England," a fine selection from Verdi's operas, also one from Wagner's "Die Walküre," &c.

The seventeenth triennial festival of parish choirs in connection with the Lichfield Diocesan Choral Association took place on the 14th ult., in Lichfield Cathedral, when the combined choirs numbered 800 voices. The music was accompanied by brass instruments and drums, in addition to the organ. Mr. J. B. Lott (organist of the Cathedral) conducted, and Mr. H. Rose (organist of Tamworth Parish Church) presided at the organ. Barnby's anthem "O how amiable" was finely rendered, and of equal merit was the same composer's hymn, "The roseate hues of early dawn." The Te Deum was sung to J. L. Hopkins's setting in G, and the Benedictus was Read in D.

An interesting violin and organ recital was given at St. George's Church, Edgbaston, on the 19th ult., by Miss Florence Donaldson and Mr. C. J. B. Meacham, the organist of the church. The programme included Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto, the same composer's Organ Sonata (No. 2), and sundry other well-chosen pieces.

The second military band concert in connection with the Edgbaston Botanical Gardens was given, on the 20th ult., by the band of the Royal Marines (Portsmouth Division), under Mr. George Miller's able conductorship. Firm attack, precision, and splendid tone quality characterised their splendid performance of the following notable pieces: Grand Fantasia on the works of Ed. Grieg, grand selection from Wagner's "Lohengrin," Dances from German's Incidental Music to "Henry VIII.," the same composer's Incidental Music to "As you like it," Wagner's "Walkürenritt," selections from Sullivan's Songs, &c.

MUSIC IN DUBLIN.

(From our own Correspondent.)

A remarkable performance of Church music took place in the new Parish Church at Bray, on Sunday, the 10th ult., under the direction of the Rev. H. Bewerunge, professor of music at Maynooth Ecclesiastical College. Not only was the performance remarkable for its excellence and for its selection, but notably for the constitution of the choir. The works given were Palestrina's Mass, "Ut, re, mi, fa, sol," sometimes called "upon the Guidonian tones"; a Te Deum by Auer, with brass septet accompaniment by the conductor; Benediction Service by Haller, and Laudate by the conductor, with the same accompaniment. The choir was made up as follows: a score or so of clergymen, mostly Mr. Bewerunge's past pupils at Maynooth; the church choir, with some additions; and about eighty children, members of two or three school choirs which had greatly distinguished themselves at the Dublin Municipal competitions. The performance of so difficult a work with the employment of little girls' voices for the upper parts was one of risk, but one that was amply justified by the result. The choir was trained to a marvel; no "leading" could be noticed, or, if any, it was by the clever little children in the upper parts. The difficulties of setting the brass septet accompaniment to Auer's Te Deum were no less successfully overcome, and the conductor's Laudate was unimpeachable in the severity of its style. The Rev. Professor of Maynooth is to be congratulated on a genuine success.

MUSIC IN GLASGOW.

The Committee of Management of the Choral and Orchestral Union is busy maturing arrangements for the forthcoming season. A fairly large guarantee fund has already been secured, and it is confidently expected that before long the amount will be further augmented. Mr. Wilhelm Bruch, formerly of Strasburg, has been appointed to succeed Mr. Kes as conductor of the orchestral concerts. Mr. Bruch is a native of Mayence, his father was a lawyer, and he studied for the same profession, but his talents and inclination led him ultimately to adopt music as a profession. Mr. Bruch received his musical education at the Cologne Conservatorium, where he became acquainted with and was a fellow student of Humperdinck. He was subsequently engaged to conduct the orchestral concerts at Freiburg (Baden), and was thereafter appointed conductor of the Strasburg Opera House, where he also directed orchestral performances. His services at Strasburg were highly valued, and when Felix Mottl was expected to leave Carlsruhe, Bruch was the favourite for that important position, the Grand Duchess of Baden (who is herself a musician) being specially interested on his behalf. The qualifications of Mr. Bruch as an excellent musician and an able conductor have received the highest testimony from Dr. Hans Richter, whose recommendation is endorsed by Humperdinck, Steinbach (of Mayence), and other eminent artists, in the most complimentary terms.

It may be of interest to note that the Marquis of Lorne has intimated that the Princess Louise and his Lordship intend to be present at the opening of the season's concerts in December next. The Princess has also been pleased to allow her name to be added to the Ladies' Committee. The choral works already fixed are "Elijah" and "Samson and Delilah."

MUSIC IN LIVERPOOL.

Although no definite or official pronouncement has yet been made in regard to the approaching season, some coming events have cast their shadows before. Thus the Philharmonic Society contemplates the production of Verdi's "Stabat Mater" and Te Deum, of Beethoven's "Ruins of Athe[illegible]ad of Handel's "Israel in Egypt" this side of Ch[illegible]hile Cowen's "Water Lily" and Rossini's [illegible]r" are talked of respectively for the ninth [illegible]ncerts. Mr. F. H. Cowen, of course, retains [illegible]as conductor, and Mr. H. A. Branscombe [illegible]-master.

[illegible]f has been found for the Musical Society in [illegible] Mr. F. H. Crossley, who has done excellent [illegible]many years past as conductor of choral [illegible]Warrington, Runcorn, and Newton-le-Willows. [illegible]tion is to hand with regard to the programme [illegible]ing season, but, judging by what Mr. Crossley [illegible]d alone may be looked for.

[illegible]e Sunday Society met on [illegible]thearsal under Mr. W. I. [illegible]rely satisfactory. Every [illegible]ersonally examined as to voice and musical ability, and none but thoroughly competent choristers have been admitted, and all receive definite emoluments for their services. The two first choral concerts are to be devoted to Mendelssohn's "Elijah" and the last act of Wagner's "Tannhäuser."

Mr. Granville Bantock has been giving some capital concerts at the Tower, New Brighton, and at the time of writing is just midway through a cycle of eight Beethoven Symphonies, which commenced on Sunday, the 3rd ult., and have continued weekly since. It was at an adjacent place of recreation, by the way, that the first Sunday concerts ever given in the North of England—viz., at the New Brighton Palace—were exploited in 1883; but they were crushed out of existence by the same local authority which has now accorded a license to their lineal descendants. It is well to see that some progress is being made in the district in question, albeit that its movements are somewhat in the nature of an Adagio.

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The annual public examinations of the Royal Manchester College of Music took place on the 4th ult. and the following three evenings. On each occasion a very large audience assembled in the beautiful hall, and the performances of the students were followed with keen interest.

The first concert consisted of Mendelssohn's music to the "Midsummer Night's Dream," with readings by Dr. Watson from those portions of the play which it illustrates. The band was composed of the members of the Principal's Orchestra Class, supported by some of the wind instrument professors, the vocal music being given by the pupils of Mrs. Hutchinson and Miss Sherrington, and by a portion of Dr. Watson's choral class. The rendering of the work was admirable, the tone and execution of the strings reflecting great credit upon Mr. Brodsky, whose untiring efforts have raised this department of the College to a high standard of excellence. The performance of the Overture and of the Wedding March left nothing to be desired, and, except for a slight unsteadiness of time at the opening of the Scherzo, the instrumental portion of the work was beyond reproach.

The second concert was devoted to ensemble playing and singing, showing what excellent work is being done in this department. Among the numbers deserving of special mention were two trios for pianoforte and strings, by Brahms and Mendelssohn respectively, the last-named being exquisitely played by boys under fifteen years of age.

At the third and fourth concerts only solo pieces were given, and, while the performances all round were of a high order, some were of such exceptional merit as to bear favourable comparison with the readings of more matured artists. Among such were the Davidoff violoncello solos of Leo Smith (Mr. Fuchs), the Vieuxtemps Concerto in E by young Arthur Catterall, the highly gifted pupil of Mr. Brodsky; the Saint-Saëns Concerto in G minor, played by Helen Brown, and the opening movement of Beethoven's Concerto in B flat by young Edward Isaacs, both pupils of Miss Olga Néruda; and the performances of Mr. Dayas's students, Irene Schaefsburg (d'Albert's Concerto in E), Edith Webster (Chopin's Concerto in E minor), Muriel Blydt (the Weber-Tausig "Invitation to the dance"), and Mary Spencer (Bach's Fugue in G sharp minor). Among the singers Ruby Keighley and Milly Jones have greatly advanced under Mrs. Hutchinson's care.

During the session just ended the connection between the College of Music and Owens College, established through the professorship of Dr. Hiles, has been greatly strengthened. Three of the students of the College have passed through the Victoria University course; two of them—J. C. Bradshaw and Thomas Keighley—already Associates of the Royal College of Music (London) and Fellows of the Royal College of Organists, with distinction. In addition to the above-named, W. R. Hampson, J. M. Potter, and W. H. Payton were presented by Dr. Hiles to the Vice-Chancellor on the 2nd ult., and received among the Bachelors of Music of the Victoria University.

A public meeting of the citizens of Manchester was held in the Town Hall, at noon, on the 19th ult., under the presidency of the Lord Mayor, when Mr. Gustav Behrens very ably propounded an admirable scheme for the permanent establishment of the orchestral concerts founded by, and still bearing the name of, Sir Charles Hallé. In the difficulties created by the sudden death of Sir Charles, just before the commencement of a season's work, three gentlemen—Mr. Behrens, Mr. Henry Simon, and Mr. James Forsyth—undertook to secure the executors from all loss, and to pay to them any profit arising during a period of three years which has now expired. During the intervening time a considerable benefit has accrued, the last winter yielding a gain of about £600. Having safely passed over the interregnum, the guarantors now desire to secure a wider and firmer basis for an Institution in which the citizens take so much pride. They propose to hand over to a body of shareholders an undertaking which not only is not likely hastily to lose its popularity, but is evidently gaining, year by year, a greater hold upon the lovers of music throughout a very large district, owing to the success of Mr. Cowen's conductorship. Moreover, the band has so wonderfully improved as now to rank among the finest and best disciplined in Europe. There is, therefore, no probability that any pecuniary responsibility could fall upon the shareholders of the new Society so long as the vigorous management of the last three years is maintained, and a goodly list of influential guarantors has been completed. Sir William Houldsworth very wisely pointed out the advisability of presenting to an annual meeting of the members a report of the condition of the Society, and of then filling up any vacancies which might occur through the death or removal of shareholders. It is not intended that any dividends should be paid; but that, after setting aside a moderate sum for contingencies, provision should be made for the retirement of aged or ailing members of the orchestra.

MUSIC IN NOTTINGHAM.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The Sacred Harmonic Society has issued the prospectus for its forty-third season. In importance it far exceeds any previous efforts and affords a most pleasing contrast to the dark times, now happily long past, when funds were low, supporters few, and imminent collapse continuously threatened the Society. The committee have again secured the services of Mr. Henry J. Wood as conductor, and include in their scheme two orchestral concerts, with the intention of encouraging the formation of a strong local orchestra. With Mr. Wood as conductor, the orchestra has a promising beginning. The Midland Orchestral Union, which was so pluckily ventured upon two seasons ago by Mr. Allen at his own risk, only partly revealed the artistic possibilities of such an undertaking; and it is certain that, with only moderate financial backing, a good band will soon firmly establish itself in this populous district. The concerts announced are a recital of Gounod's opera "Irene," for November 9, and an orchestral concert, on December 8 (for which we are glad to notice the engagement of Miss Cantelo as solo pianist in Beethoven's "Emperor" Concerto). "The Messiah" is down for Boxing Day; Sullivan's "Martyr of Antioch" for February 9; the second orchestral concert is put down for March 2; and Mendelssohn's "Elijah," with Madame Ella Russell, Miss Hilda Wilson, Messrs. William Green and Andrew Black as soloists, will close the season on March 23. The spirited policy of recent years, which has brought the Society to its present strong position, has been greatly assisted by the reserve fund of about £1,000 established by a legacy from the estate of the late Mr. Alsop.

MUSIC IN PARIS.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The principal event of interest at the Grand Opéra was the resumption, on the 11th ult., of the "Lohengrin" performances, with Mdlle. Ackté in the part of Elsa, Mdlle. Picard in that of Ortrud, and M. Vaguet as the Knight of the Swan. Mdlle. Marcy is announced to make her début here in September as Sieglinde in "Die Walküre."

The Opéra Comique closed its doors on June 30, when the lease of the house expired, and it is thought that the new theatre will be ready for inauguration on October 15. Performances of Puccini's "La Bohème" and M. Saint-Saëns's "Proserpine" will then be resumed. Meantime the usual représentation gratuite, in connection with the 14th of July celebrations, could not, of course, be given this year.

As regards other establishments where, as customary during the summer months, performances of opera are given, some unusual activity is being displayed this year on the part of entrepreneurs. At the Variétés, where an interesting season was opened a few weeks since, the first representation took place, on the 1st ult., of a lyrical drama, "Sœur Marthe," in three acts, the libretto from the pen of MM. Ch. Richet and Octave Houdaille, the music by M. Frédéric Le Rey. Hypnotism is the strange subject of this new work, the action of which is placed in the year 1779, at the period when the doctrines of Mesmer first began to take root. The score is constructed on the old operatic lines, with airs, concerted numbers, &c., and is a musicianlike production, without, however, exhibiting any very marked originality. The principal parts found excellent interpreters in Mdlle. Martini and M. Leprestre, who were well supported by Mdlle. Markensie and M. Labis. M. Samara's "La Martyre" is in active preparation and will be shortly brought out for the first time in Paris. Amongst other works already given here may be named "Il Trovatore," "Lucia," and others, while there are frequent changes in the respective casts, the management having evidently a considerable number of very efficient artists at their disposal.

The concert season has come to a close and will not re-commence until October.

MUSIC IN AMERICA.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The twentieth convention of the Music Teachers' National Association was held at the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel, New York City, from June 23 to 27. Although this organisation has a history of twenty years it has not, during that period, occupied an important place in American music, chiefly because we have not had much that was distinctly American in our musical life. Moreover, with a few exceptions, the real leaders in musical progress have not been connected with the Association. This year, largely through the efforts of Herbert Wilbur Green, President, the whole status of the meeting was elevated. A better programme, which therefore compared favourably with that of 1897, was provided; excellent facilities for all the meetings were secured at the Waldorf-Astoria, and the general tone of the whole affair was improved.

The convention was opened with an address of welcome by the Vice-Mayor of New York and the President's annual address. Then followed a lecture on "The Orchestra and its Instruments," by Mr. W. J. Henderson of The Times, who, according to the last accounts, was navigating one of our monitors in the war with Spain. Mr. Henderson's lecture was illustrated by the American Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Sam Franko. The remainder of the afternoon was mainly occupied by a "Symposium on General Culture in Music." The discussion was participated in by people from various sections, and there was more symposium than culture in it.

Thursday evening was devoted to a concert, when Miss Lehmann's "In a Persian Garden," among other things, was sung, and Miss Ethel Crane and Mr. Carl Duff carried off the honours.

Church Music.

On Friday afternoon there was a symposium on "Church Music," with Mr. Cecil Poole as chairman. The following gentlemen took part: Mr. Thomas Whitney Surette, Mr. Geo. Edward Stubbs, and Mr. Walter Henry Hall. Mr. Surette spoke on the general aspects of Church music in America to-day, not confining himself to the music of the Protestant Episcopal Church, but pointing out where the defects in our methods lie and giving many practical hints to our choirmasters and organists. He held that in our controversy concerning boy choirs, mixed choirs, and quartet choirs, we have lost sight of the fundamental principles of Church music; that we attempt too much; that even in the Episcopal churches one may hear most incongruous services, and many fruitless attempts at elaborate music entirely out of keeping with the time and place, while in churches of other denominations any absurdity may be perpetrated: quartet choirs, in which the soprano and her bonnet are very much in evidence, and the music suggests comic opera; hymns pitched too high and sung with sentimental pathos; organ voluntaries from "Semiramide" or "Tannhäuser"—all these glaring faults are to be found in churches where every attempt is made to appear religious and when all is supposed to blend in a common purpose of worship. This is all susceptible of change, said the speaker, and it lies not alone with the organist, but the congregations to bring the change about.

Mr. Stubbs confined his remarks to boy choirs and the Cathedral service, and, with refreshing frankness, talked to his audience as though they were all Protestant Episcopalians. He asserted that most of the leading organists and choirmasters from San Francisco to Boston were Englishmen; and that the antagonism of American organists against boy choirs had produced this deplorable state. He further claimed, and rightly, that we have no right to mutilate the service of the English Church, which had been handed down to us as an heritage, and that mixed choirs of men and women are an offence in the eyes of all good churchmen. These vigorous remarks were hardly out of the speaker's mouth before half-a-dozen people were on their feet ready for the fray; and Mr. Stubbs had the pleasure of having himself called a Papist and an ignoramus (which I am sure he enjoyed), and that too by a lady. Mr. Walter Henry Hall, of St. James's Church, spoke in defence of Mr. Stubbs's position, and served somewhat to allay the excitement; but the audience was evidently not of Mr. Stubbs's persuasion, and Mr. Surette had to be finally called on to calm the troubled sea of discussion.

There is no more necessary work in Church music in America at the present time than that of setting right the standards as to what Church music really is, and eradicating the many absurd faults under which it now suffers.

The Friday evening concert was most enjoyable. Mr. Horatio Parker conducted the orchestra in his Overture "Count Robert of Paris," Mr. Bruno Oscar Klein gave his three American Dances, and Mr. William H. Sherwood played Raff's Pianoforte Concerto in C minor. The first of these compositions was thoroughly creditable to American music. As much can hardly be said of a violin concerto by Mr. Homer Bartlett. The remainder of the convention included an excellent performance of "St. Paul," by the Brooklyn Oratorio Society, under the conductorship of Mr. Walter Henry Hall.

Mr. H. E. Krehbiel, of the Tribune, gave a lecture-recital on "Folk-song in America," with vocal illustrations by Mrs. Krehbiel; and on Sunday there were special musical services at several of the churches, Calvary and St. James's being the most attractive. In addition to this, Mr. Max Heinrich gave a song recital on Monday afternoon.

The attendance at the convention numbered 1,500, and there were many evidences that the organization might be of great service to American music, provided the best men could be interested in it. A movement towards this end was started, and at the delegates' meeting Mr. Horatio Parker was nominated honorary president, and Mr. George Coleman Gow, secretary. The next meeting is to be held in Cincinnati.

Under the auspices of The Incorporated Staff Sight Singing College, Dr. F. J. Sawyer gave a lecture on "How to teach Sight Singing from the Staff," at the Athenæum Hall, Brighton, on the 2nd ult., with Mr. W. H. Cummings in the chair; which he repeated at the Church of England High School for Girls, Upper Baker Street, a week later. On both occasions Dr. Sawyer, who is professor of sight singing at the Royal College of Music, treated his subject in a very pleasant, lucid, and fluent manner, and successfully demonstrated, with a class of students, the practicability of his methods. We are officially informed that during the month of June "the examinations of the College have been held at London, Dublin, Cardiff, Carmarthen, Wolverhampton, and Brighton. Several hundreds of candidates in the aggregate have been examined, about eighty per cent. of whom have been successful, and nearly fifty per cent. have passed with honours. The examinations have been mainly in the two lowest and two highest grades. In all cases they have proved most satisfactory to all concerned, and the principals of schools at which the examinations have been held are enthusiastic over the methods pursued and the results achieved."

The London Academy of Music gave a concert at St. George's Hall, on the 22nd ult., preparatory to the presentation by Miss Clara Butt of diplomas and medals to students successful in the recent examinations. In both the vocal and instrumental elements of the programme a few instances of ambition exceeding discretion was observable, whilst in others exceptional ability was manifested. In the latter class must be ranked Miss Lucy King-Hall, a young pianist, who played with firmness, judgment, and considerable refinement Schütt's "Carnaval Mignon," the effect created by which mainly depends upon the executant. Tschaïkowsky's "Chanson Triste" and Moszkowski's "Etincelles" were neatly rendered by Miss Rosalind Borowski, also a pianist, and Misses Alice Liebmann and Zeta Mason distinguished themselves as violinists. With all the requisite spirit Miss Mabel Calkin sang Chaminade's "L'été," and the solo pieces were interspersed by careful performances by a string orchestra under the conductorship of Mr. A. Pollitzer.

Mr. Ernest Fowles may be congratulated on the creditable efforts of his pupils at a concert in the Queen's (Small) Hall on June 30. A successful feature was Reinecke's Impromptu for two pianofortes upon a theme from Schumann's "Manfred," neatly rendered by Miss Joyce Guthrie and Mr. Fowles. Special attention was bestowed upon a Sonata in B flat for pianoforte and violin, a skilfully constructed work by Mr. Leonard Fowles, who took part with Miss Jeannie Oliver in a performance that evoked approbation. For Mr. Algernon Ashton's "Tonbilder" for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, Miss Helen Harper, Mr. Hopkinson, and Mr. Prosper Burnett were responsible. An arrangement of two of Dvorák's Slavonic Dances for two pianofortes received careful interpretation from Misses Dora Whitlie, Marian Skinner, Maude Easten, and Agnes Burtt. Very acceptable was Mr. Reginald Chalcraft's smooth delivery of songs by Schumann and Tschaïkowsky.

At a concert at Trinity College, London, on the 5th ult., marked ability was displayed by several of the students, particularly in the instrumental department. In violin pieces by Vieuxtemps and Wieniawski respectively fair command of the instrument, together with taste and perception of effect, was evinced by Messrs. Frank Greenfield and Sidney J. Faulks. As usual, the pianists were in strong force. Miss Winifred Palfreman played Moszkowski's Valse (Op. 34) with decision and judgment, Miss Mary Large ably rendered Chopin's Nocturne in E, Miss Jessie L. Jamieson's execution of Liszt's Polonaise in E was not wanting in spirit, and to a piece by Scharwenka Mrs. Halket Halkett did justice. The last-named player gave a recital at the College on the 11th ult., and made a favourable impression in a programme drawn from Brahms, Schumann, Chopin, Rubinstein, Moszkowski, and others. The vocalist was Miss Bushnell.

Miss Maud Agnes Winter at her concert in Queen's (Small) Hall, on the 12th ult., justified the hopes of her professors at Trinity College, London, and of her private friends. In her pianoforte performances she manifested exceptional command of technique for a youthful executant and perception of the varied spirit pervading the works interpreted. She played with correctness and fervour Beethoven's "Sonata Appassionata," the opening Allegro being specially well rendered; Schumann's "Papillons," Chopin's Fantasia in F minor, and a series of lighter pieces.

Digitized by Google

After each of these solos Miss Winter was warmly complimented. With Messrs. L. Szczepanowski and Hans Brousil (respectively violin and violoncello) she contributed her share towards an excellent rendering of Beethoven's Trio in C minor. The vocalist was Madame Zippora Monteith.

The Alexandra Palace Choir again displayed fitness for the interpretation of standard sacred compositions on the 23rd ult., when "The Hymn of Praise" was successfully performed, under the baton of Mr. Henry J. Baker. The choruses were sung with spirit and impulse, and the rendering of the orchestration was generally meritorious. This always acceptable work was preceded by the Overture to "Athalie" and by Mr. W. Augustus Barratt's cantata "Lancelot and Elaine." The latter, not previously performed in London, has some effective points without being specially striking in character. The composer received justice from all engaged. Miss Marie Elba and Mr. William Higley respectively gave the soprano and baritone solos expressively, whilst the execution of the choral and instrumental features was adequate.

Amongst the large number of concerts which have taken place since the last issue of The Musical Times the following merit record:—

Queen's (Small) Hall.—Miss Clara Blackburne's concert, June 28; Signor Scoma's concert, 28th ult.; Miss Rina Allerton, June 29; Miss Ethel Bonavia's pianoforte recital, 5th ult.; Mrs. Kate Lee's vocal recital, 18th ult.

Steinway Hall.—Mr. Mawson-Marks's concert, 5th ult.; Mdlles. Emile and Gabrielle Christmann's vocal recital, 20th ult.; Mr. Douglas Boxall's pianoforte recital, 21st ult.

Salle Erard.—Madame Anne de Vergniol, June 28; Miss Emma Barker, June 29; Miss Marie Dubois's pianoforte recital, 15th ult.

Madame Kate Ockleston-Lippa's lecture-recital of several of Schumann's compositions, which took place at Steinway Hall, on the 14th ult., was of genuine educational value. She lucidly explained the constituent elements of the productions, drawing attention to all their noteworthy points, and, wherever possible, indicated the meaning of the composer. As a pianist, Madame Ockleston-Lippa was heard to advantage in the Sonata in G minor and in extracts from the "Kinderscenen," the dainty spirit of the last-named being most artistically reflected.

Miss Ingram Tucker and Miss Sargood Alexander gave a concert at Steinway Hall, on the 19th ult., when they were assisted by Madame Medora Henson, Mr. Braxton Smith, Mr H. Lane Wilson, and others. Miss Tucker made a decided impression in her rendering of "To Music" (Schubert) and in Mrs. Needham's "Husheen" (accompanied by the composer); and Miss Alexander was very successful in "A Song of Thanksgiving" (Allitsen) and "Absent, yet present" (M. V. White).

Under the direction of Messrs. Leonard Buttress and Gilbert Heron (of Her Majesty's Theatre), a pastoral performance of "As you like it" was successfully given in the grounds of the Alexandra Palace, on the 14th ult. The vocal solos, "Under the greenwood tree" and "Blow, blow, thou winter wind," were excellently sung by Mr. Kent Sutton, who played Amiens. The Bohemian Ladies' Orchestra accompanied the vocal music and played a selection during the intervals.

Particulars of the Composers' Competitions at the third Feis Ceoil (Irish Musical Festival), to be held in the Emerald Isle next year, have now been issued, and may be obtained upon application to the Hon. Secretaries, 19, Lincoln Place, Dublin. Prizes to the amount of upwards of £100 in the aggregate are offered, and compositions must be sent in not later than January 1, 1899.

We regret that, owing to a slight error in the report of the Nonconformist Choir Union Festival in our last issue, the name of the winning choir in the choral competition was wrongly given. It should have been the United Methodist Free Church Choir, Littleborough, not the Primitive Methodist Choir, who were the victors on that occasion.

FOREIGN NOTES.

Absam (Tyrol).—A long-standing debt of gratitude to the memory of Jacob Stainer, the celebrated violin maker, has at length been discharged by the erection of a handsome memorial stone over his grave in the churchyard of this, his native town. Musical societies from neighbouring towns took part in the dedication ceremony, on the 10th ult., Professor Friedrich Stolz, of Innsbruck University, delivering an interesting discourse on the occasion. Stainer was born at Absam in 1621, and after a somewhat checkered career died here, demented and in poverty, in 1683.

Augsburg.—Dr. Chrysander has just completed his edition of Handel's oratorio "Israel in Egypt," which, like his version of "The Messiah," is to be first produced by the Oratorio Society of this town in December next. In the present version the Bergedorf savant has been concerned chiefly with restoring a number of hitherto neglected airs appertaining to the original score.

Barcelona.—The first performance here of Berlioz's Requiem took place on the 8th ult., at the Palace of Fine Arts, under the very able conductorship of Señor Nicolau. The grand work—the choice of which, under the prevailing circumstances of the country, was but too appropriate—created a profound impression upon the numerous audience.

Berlin.—After a very successful performance of the "Nibelungen" cycle, the Royal Opera closed its doors at the beginning of last month, the greater part of the leading members departing to enjoy a well earned rest, while some few remain to support the personnel of the New Royal Opera House (formerly Kroll's), where performances of opera are carried on during the summer months and before crowded audiences. Here Madame Arnoldson continues to be a great attraction in favourite parts, while M. Lasalle, the famous Paris baritone, also had to add several appearances to those originally contemplated. At the West-end Theatre Mdlle. Prevosti has been drawing full houses in "Carmen," "Trovatore," and "Il Barbiere," as well as Frau Sedlmair, whose appearance in the parts of Fidelio and of Norma created much enthusiasm. This theatre is to be entirely devoted to opera in the future, and a number of interesting works, both old and new, are promised during the coming Autumn season.——A new concert hall is shortly to be opened here, intended chiefly for orchestral and chamber concerts. It will be called "Beethoven Saal" and will contain over a thousand seats.——The new catalogue which has just been published by Herr Liepmannsohn, the antiquarian bookseller, is devoted exclusively to Wagner, Liszt, and Berlioz, and contains 483 numbers, 379 of which appertain to Wagnerian literature.——M. Jacques van Lier, formerly leading violoncellist of the Philharmonic orchestra, has been appointed to a professorship at the Klindworth-Scharwenka Conservatorium, where he will also conduct a chamber music class.

Carlsbad.—Under the auspices of the Carlsbad Musikverein, a commemorative tablet has been placed at the house, in the Hirschensprung Gasse, where Johannes Brahms resided during his sojourn here in 1896. The ceremony of unveiling took place on the 10th ult., and included musical performances by the Cur Orchestra and the local choral society, as well as an able address by Musik-director Alois Janetschek.

Dresden.—The Royal Orchestra is preparing to celebrate, on September 22, the 350th anniversary of its foundation. Among the more or less eminent conductors of this venerable Institution were C. M. von Weber and Richard Wagner, and it was under the conductorship of the latter that the tercentenary was commemorated, in 1848, by an important musical performance and a speech delivered by the master which has since assumed considerable historical significance. On the present occasion the Royal Orchestra propose, by way of special homage to the genius of its greatest conductor, to include a number of Wagner's compositions in the programme of the festival, the proceeds of which are to be devoted to a fund for the erection of a Wagner monument in the Saxon capital.

Leipzig.—Dr. Carl Reinecke has just completed the score of a fairy opera in two acts, entitled "Der Kleine Sapperlot," after a well-known story by Rudolph Baumbach, intended, in the first place, for performance by juvenile interpreters.——Herr Wilhelm Kienzl, composer of "Der Evangelimann," has published the libretto of his new opera, "Don Quixote," which is to be first brought out at Berlin. It deals very ably with various episodes in Cervantes' great novel.

Milan.—Umberto Giordano, the successful composer of "André Chénier," has completed the score of a new operatic work, "Fedora," the libretto founded on the well-known French drama, which is to be brought out at the Teatro Lirico, of Milan, in October next. Signora Gemma Bellincioni and the young tenor, Signor Caruso, will sustain the principal parts.——Owing to the activity displayed on the part of an influential syndicate of amateurs, ample subscriptions have been forthcoming to ensure the resumption of operatic performances at La Scala in the coming season. Under these circumstances, the Municipal authorities have, it is said, likewise consented to renew their annual subvention of £6,000. Signor Gatti-Casazza, formerly manager of the Municipal Theatre, Ferrara, has been appointed director of La Scala.

Munich.—The thirtieth anniversary of a memorable first performance—that of Wagner's exquisite musical comedy of "Die Meistersinger"—was celebrated, on June 21, at the Royal Opera by an excellent special performance of the work, under Court-Capellmeister Fischer's direction, and with Fräulein Hofman, Herren Bertram, Mikorey, and Friedrichs in principal parts. On the occasion of its original production the master had himself superintended the rehearsals, Dr. von Bülow being the conductor and Dr. Richter the director of the chorus, and the enthusiastic reception accorded to the work on the part of the great majority of those present made some amends for the unworthy intrigues which three years previously had caused Wagner to give up his residence in the Bavarian capital. As regards the original interpreters, two, Herren Bausewein and Schlosser, are still active members of the Munich opera, while Herr Nachbaur, who "created" the part of Walther von Stolzing, remains attached to the institution as an honorary member. Herr Betz, of Berlin, who was the Hans Sachs, has been presented by the Prince Regent with the gold medal for Arts and Sciences in honour of this notable anniversary.——The new three-act comic opera "Zinober," by Herr Siegmund von Hausegger, was brought out on June 19, at the Royal Theatre, under Herr Richard Strauss's direction, and obtained a complete success, to which an excellent interpretation contributed its share. The libretto, from the pen of the composer, is founded upon Hoffmann's fanciful story, which has been effectively dramatised, and the music is the work of a gifted and frequently highly original composer. Herr von Hausegger is only in his twenty-fifth year, and a native of Graz.——The now annually recurring performance of Beethoven's nine symphonies by the Kaim orchestra was announced to commence on the 22nd ult., under Professor Loewe's direction.

Prague.—A new operetta, "Der Opernball," by Herr Richard Heuberger, an esteemed Viennese musical critic and composer, was brought out at the German Theatre here, on June 25, with great success. The libretto is an operatic version of the well-known comedy "The Pink Dominoes."

Recanti.—On the occasion of the centenary celebrations here of the birth of the poet Leopardi, on June 29 and following days, a symphonic poem by Signor Mascagni, written for the occasion, was performed by the orchestra of the Liceo Rossini, of Pesaro, under the composer's direction. The work, which is intended to illustrate the main features of the great poet's inner life and pessimistic world-conception (an ambitious task, it must be admitted, for the composer of "Cavalleria" to set himself), and concluding with an apotheosis of Leopardi, was received with enthusiasm, and had to be repeated in its entirety. The statue of the poet unveiled during the celebrations is the work of the sculptor Monteverde, a lineal descendant of the illustrious composer and creator of Italian opera.

Rome.—Baron Franchetti's new opera, "Il Signor di Pourceaugnac," was produced for the first time at the Politeama Theatre, on the 9th ult., and well received. Mascagni's new operatic work, "Iris," is to be brought out shortly at the Costanzi Theatre.——The first prize in a competition opened some time since by the Saint Cecilia Academy here has been awarded, for a string quartet, to Signor Giuseppe Frugatta, a professor at the Milan Conservatorio.

St. Petersburg.—A highly successful grand concert devoted to French music was given here, on the 14th ult., under the direction of M. Chevilard, the well-known Paris conductor. Madame Gorlenko-Dolina, the eminent Russian prima donna, to whose initiative the concert was chiefly owing, took part.——Madame Sigrid Arnoldson, the Swedish prima donna, has been engaged for the coming season of Italian opera at the Imperial Theatre. She will appear on thirty evenings, amongst other parts, as Elsa in "Lohengrin."

Schwerin.—A new operetta entitled "Farinelli," and dealing with some episodes in the career of that celebrated singer, was brought out last month at the Court Theatre with considerable success. The composer is Herr Zumpe, the well-known excellent conductor and Court-Capellmeister here.

The Hague.—The Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, under the direction of Capellmeister Rebizek, is giving its annual series of orchestral concerts at the Curaal, in Scheveningen, just now, to crowded audiences. A new symphonic poem, "Mary Stuart," by Herr Aertel, recently produced for the first time, met with a highly favourable reception.——Leopold Auer, the eminent Russian violin virtuoso and director of the Philharmonic Concerts in St. Petersburg, is expected to give several recitals here during the current month.

Toulouse.—The first performance here of Haydn's "Seasons," last month, merits a record. It was given by the Cecilia Society, under the Abbé Mathieu's direction, and it is satisfactory to add that it was greatly appreciated and that a second performance had to be given.

Turin.—In connection with the present International Exhibition, three choral concerts were given here last month by the celebrated Paris Choir of St. Jervais, under the conductorship of M. Charles Bordes, with enormous success, to which the co-operation of the excellent Paris organist, M. Tournemire, contributed not a little.

Vienna.—On the 10th ult., Viennese journals remind us, one hundred years had elapsed since the first performance, at the Court Theatre, "near the Kärntner Thor," of Mozart's "Le Nozze di Figaro" in the German language, in which form it was thenceforward embodied in the permanent repertory of the Imperial Theatre.——The estate of the late Johannes Brahms (which, after the now nearly completed liquidation, will amount to some £20,000) was, it will be remembered, bequeathed by the master, in an informal document, to the Viennese Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde. The tribunal to whom the question of legality had been submitted has at length pronounced in favour of the document, thus placing the famous Viennese Institution in an advantageous position in the event of an appeal against this decision on the part of blood relations of the master.——The vacancy caused by the retirement some time since of Dr. Hanslick from the professorship of æsthetics and musical history at the University, which post he had held for over twenty-five years, has at length been filled. His successor, Dr. Guido Adler, hitherto professor at the University of Prague, is a distinguished music historian, and co-founder (with Dr. Chrysander and Spitta) of the "Vierteljahrs-Schrift für Musik-Wissenschaft."——An influential committee has been formed with a view to the erection in this capital of a monument to Simon Sechter, the great contrapuntist and teacher, and the removal of his remains to the Central Cemetery, where so many of the immortals in musical art have, of late years, been assigned their, it may be hoped, final resting-place.

Sir Alexander Mackenzie, Professor Villiers Stanford, and others who are prominently interesting themselves in the important question of a Municipal Opera House, had an interview of a private character, on the 11th ult., with the members of the London County Council, by whom the project appeared to be favourably received.

OBITUARY.

A veteran organist has passed away in the person of John George Boardman, who died at 302, Clapham Road, on the 2nd ult., at the age of seventy-nine. Mr. Boardman, who was born at Kennington on July 10, 1819, became a chorister of St. Paul's Cathedral at the age of nine. Amongst his fellow-choristers were the late G. W. Martin, the late William Makepeace, and Mr. John Hopkins, the present organist of Rochester Cathedral, the last two having been the teachers of Sir Frederick Bridge. Boardman was a pupil of Thomas Attwood, and during his choristership at St. Paul's he was organist of St. Mary Aldermary. He was organist successively of Carlisle Chapel, Kennington (two of his predecessors there having been Benjamin Jacob and Thomas Adams), Sydenham Episcopal Chapel (1835-43), All Saints', Beulah Hill, Norwood (1843-45), St. John's, Clapham Rise, and finally at St. Mark's, Kennington, from 1862 till his retirement in 1894. In 1845 Mr. Boardman became professor of music, and in the following year organist of Clapham Grammar School, where for thirty-two years he did splendid work and raised the Chapel services to a high pitch of excellence. Mr. Boardman's name was often prominently before the public as the deputy of James Coward and Mr. Alfred J. Eyre at the Crystal Palace, where the programmes of his recitals on the great organ were always good. He was also organist to the National Choral Society, of which the late G. W. Martin was conductor. On May 25, 1858, Mr. Boardman conducted a performance of Handel's "Esther" at a concert of the Cecilian Society, given at Albion Hall, London Wall. This was probably its first performance since Handel's day. It was certainly seventeen years earlier than the presentation of the work at the Alexandra Palace on November 6, 1875, which is often given as the date of the revival of Handel's first English oratorio. In 1851 he took the degree of Bachelor in Music at Dublin University, under the Professorship of the late Dr. John Smith, but strangely enough he never made use of the degree. Mr. Boardman's compositions were almost exclusively for the Church, and included an anthem, "Almighty and most merciful God," dedicated to Mr. (now Sir) George Grove, an alumnus of Clapham Grammar School under the celebrated Rev. Charles Pritchard. Since his retirement from Sunday duty, and when well enough to do so, Mr. Boardman was very fond of attending service at St. Paul's Cathedral, the last occasion being on the first Sunday of the present year, when he told Mr. John S. Bumpus (to whom we are greatly indebted for much of our information) that he sat in the choir, in order to be as near as possible to the very spot where, seventy years before, he had sung as a chorister. Mr. Boardman was the first to sing the solo in Attwood's anthem "Come, Holy Ghost," under circumstances to which we specially refer in another column (p. 524). To the last he kept himself in touch with musical doings and events by regularly reading his Musical Times, to which he was one of the original subscribers in 1844. Mr. Boardman was widely known in South London and very highly esteemed in his professional and private life. His remains were interred at Norwood Cemetery, the funeral service having been previously held at St. Mark's, Kennington, where he had played for thirty-two years. The death of Mr. Boardman removes a distinguished organist of the old school, one of those who, in their day, did "good, solid, substantial work" in a manner calling for the highest commendation and emulation.

The death is announced of Mr. William Scadding, for upwards of twenty-five years organist of Newport Church, Isle of Wight, which occurred at Newport on June 16, at the age of fifty-three. Mr. Scadding, who was a native of Taunton, was for nine years organist of Her Majesty's private Chapel at Osborne, and the composer of the "Osborne" March, written in 1887 for the Queen's Jubilee and frequently performed by the Queen's command.

The death is announced, on June 24, at Leipzig, where he had lived in retirement for some years past, of Heinrich Wolff, the doyen of German violinists, at the age of eighty-five. On arriving in Vienna to give his first concert there he was surprised to find the city in mourning: it was the day of Beethoven's funeral! Wolff subsequently made the acquaintance of Paganini, with whom he was frequently associated in the performance of chamber music. Amongst other treasured reminiscences of Wolff's artistic career was the friendship he formed with Mendelssohn, with whom he tried over a number of the latter's compositions from manuscript, amongst them the quintet (with two violas), in which Mendelssohn played the second viola.

Joseph Luigini, for many years conductor of the Grand Théâtre at Lyons, and afterwards of the Théâtre Italien, Paris, died in that capital on the 8th ult. He was the first to produce Verdi's "Aïda" in Paris.

Amongst the passengers who lost their lives on board the ill-fated steamer "Bourgogne" were two excellent artists, members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra: Leon Pourtou, a clarinet virtuoso of considerable reputation, and the solo oboist, Herr Weiss.

We have also to record the following deaths:—

On June 24, at New York, Frank Elmore, concert baritone and successful teacher, aged fifty-nine.

On June 26, at his residence, Friesland, Hesketh Park, Southport, in his seventy-fourth year, Nicolas L. van Gruisen, founder of the firm of Messrs. N. L. van Gruisen and Son, of Liverpool.

On June 22, at Birmingham, Mrs. J. Redfern Mason, née Linda Morton, pianist.

CORRESPONDENCE.

ANTICS OF PIANISTS.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—A question which came forcibly before my mind after a recent pianoforte recital is this: Is it justifiable for a pianist to try and express to his hearers what he conceives to be the emotional characteristics of what he is playing by means of "facial play" and gesticulations of various kinds? I think not. Should not the highest aim of a performer be to make his hearers forget his own personality and imagine they are hearing the music direct from the composer as he conceived it? This is impossible if the player is perpetually reminding them of his own presence. Moreover, such behaviour seems to me to put an "earthy" spirit into the performance. Surely music should appeal to the soul, not to the body; and to this end should be allowed to tell its own story quietly, and not be doled out to us as a sort of animal food, with a spicing of gestures and grimaces to bring out the flavour. Have we not enough to put up with from pianists, with all their tricks in interpretation, without additional antics?

Yours truly,
A. F. J.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY AND COLONIAL NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

Auckland (New Zealand).—The first concert of the season of the Auckland Liedertafel took place at the Choral Hall on May 20, when an interesting programme was admirably performed, under the able direction of Mr. Arthur Towsey. Special mention must be made of the poetic annotations to the various pieces in the book of words. An instance of the felicitous manner in which they were selected is furnished in the following "motto" to Hatton's delightful part-song "The way to build a boat":

> Build me straight, O worthy master,
> Staunch and strong—a goodly vessel,
> That shall laugh at all disaster.
> Longfellow.

Folkestone.—An interesting pianoforte and vocal recital was given in the Town Hall, on June 24, by Miss Jessie Field, an accomplished pianist from the Raff Conservatorium, Frankfort, and Mr. Theo. Field (late pupil of Mr. Fred. Walker), who possesses a bass voice of great beauty. The programme was sustained with uniform excellence throughout and both artists were accorded a hearty reception.

Forest Gate.—The students of the Conservatoire of Music and Arts, Romford Road, Forest Gate, gave a very successful concert at Stratford Town Hall, on June 16, when H. E. Nicholl's operetta "Will-o'-the-Wisp" was performed by the choir in an eminently praiseworthy manner. Mr. Louis Robbins gave two violin solos, "Prélude: Le déluge," Saint-Saëns, and "La Cascade," Hauser, and songs were well rendered by Miss Agnes Walter, Miss Annie Wilson, and Mr. Richard Triggs. Mr. Cuthbert Harris played four organ pieces and also contributed two pianoforte solos—Prelude, by Rachmaninoff, and a Valse Caprice from his own pen.

Guildford.—At the Constitutional Hall, on the 9th ult., and in connection with the Guildford School of Music, Mr. Henry Tolhurst gave an interesting lecture on Handel and his works, illustrated by a number of monochromes, specially prepared by Mr. Oscar Tolhurst for the occasion. The musical illustrations were admirably performed by Miss S. Greatorex and Mr. Charles E. Tinney (vocalists), Miss Isabel Wheeler and Miss Amy Trench (pianists), and Miss Mabel Galway (violin).

Ilfracombe.—A gratifying testimonial was presented, on the 4th ult., to Dr. J. T. Gardner, who has been conductor of the Ilfracombe Choral Society since its commencement. The testimonial took the form of a very handsome "grandfather" clock, in a handsomely-carved oak case, having both Whittington and Westminster chimes, and costing seventy guineas. Mrs. Basset, of Watermouth Castle, in some well chosen words, made the presentation on behalf of the Society, and Dr. Gardner made a suitable reply. An illuminated album, containing the names of the subscribers, formed an appropriate accompaniment to the main theme of the Society's mark of appreciation of its esteemed conductor.

Leeds.—A special series of twelve invitation recitals and concerts were given twice daily, in the large concert-room of Messrs. Haddock's College of Music, during the week ending the 16th ult. Many of the students, assisted by their professors, took part in the varied, and, in many cases very difficult programmes, arousing much enthusiasm by their meritorious performances.

Organ Appointments.—Mr. J. A. Bailey, Organist and Choirmaster to St. Clement's Church, Sandwich, Kent.—Mr. H. G. Williams, to the Church of the Good Shepherd, Lee, Kent.—Mr. C. K. James, to All Saints' Church, Stoneycroft.—Mr. A. F. Barnes, Organ Scholar at Keble College, Oxford.—Mr. T. I. Pace, to the Parish Church, Ashford, Middlesex.—Mr. Martin B. Chenhall, to St. John's, Lee, Hexham.—Mr. Arthur J. H. Townsend, to Christ Church, Bridlington.

Choir Appointments.—Mr. D. Gibson Bishop, Choirmaster to St. Jude's Church, Kensal Green.—Mr. Henry Clements, Solo Tenor to St. Paul's, New Beckenham.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Gamba.—The chorales in Mendelssohn's "Six Sonatas for the Organ" are as follows: Sonata, No. 1—"Was mein Gott will." This is an eight-lined tune, but the composer has made use of the first four lines only. Although Mendelssohn wrote the title of the chorale in his manuscript, strangely enough it has never been printed in the various editions. Sonata, No. 3—"Aus tiefer Noth," in its original form. Sonata, No. 5—the chorale seems to be an original one by Mendelssohn, all efforts to trace it in other directions having proved fruitless. It is a five-lined tune, and therefore somewhat unusual in German hymnody. Sonata No. 6—Mendelssohn has introduced the famous six-lined chorale, "Vater unser im Himmelreich," into everyone of the six movements, except the last in D major. Sonatas, 2 and 4, contain no chorales.

G. L.—The following are the English equivalents to the abbreviations in Breitkopf and Härtel's edition (Reinecke) of Bach's "Das wohltemperirte Clavier":— Th. = subject. Antw. = answer. Cp. = counter-subject. Zw. = episode. Th. Mot. = subject motive, or part of subject. Im. = Imitation. Uebl. = codetta (intervening, connecting, or transition passage). M.c. = by inversion. p.a. = by augmentation. Engf. = stretto. p.d. = by diminution. You would find Dr. Iliffe's Primer, "Analysis of Bach's 48 Preludes and Fugues" (Novello), a most invaluable aid in the study of these matchless creations.

H. A. B.—We dare not divulge, even if we knew, the secrets of obtaining "a hood, cap, and gown by passing an easy examination in practical and theoretical music." Nor can we suggest "any musical institution where you can obtain the hood, &c., by composing a piece or exercise at home and sending it in." A hood obtained in this homely manner might become, without any alteration, a cloak for mediocrity—at least, so it seems to us.

Pellonell.—The duet about which you enquire is entitled "Son esse! Oh! giubilo," by Cagnoni, which, as your memory recalls, used to be sung by Madame Clara Novello and Mr. Sims Reeves. It is published by Messrs. Novello and Company, Limited.

Choirmaster.—There is no rule governing the out-going voluntary. People generally take it quite literally and depart while it is being performed. This would apply to the "Hallelujah" chorus, especially if it were not played particularly well.

Baritone.—We venture to suggest the following metronome rates for Handel's (so-called) "Cuckoo and Nightingale" Concerto for the organ. Larghetto ♩ = 56; Allegro ♩ = 84; Larghetto ♪. = 88; Allegro ♩ = 88.

W. M. S.—You will find an excellent account of the recent musical festival at Bergen, written by Mr. J. S. Shedlock, in the Athenæum of the 9th ult.

A. H.—See "Sailors' Chanties," published by Messrs. Boosey and Co., which will probably answer your requirements for "Capstan melodies."

Undergraduate.—In Sterndale Bennett's "Rondo Piacevole," bar 93, second chord in the left hand, the upper note should be A natural, not A sharp.

A. S.—We gave information about easy organ sonatas in our last issue. See the reply to "Sonatina," p. 487.

Scot.—Taking all the circumstances into consideration, we think that Dresden would be preferable to Berlin.

 Notices of Concerts, of which programmes must invariably be sent, and other information supplied by our friends in the country, must be forwarded to us immediately after the occurrence; otherwise they cannot possibly be inserted.

Our correspondents will oblige by writing all names as clearly as possible, as we cannot be responsible for any mistakes that may occur.

Correspondents are informed that their names and addresses must accompany all communications.

We cannot undertake to return offered contributions; the authors, therefore, will do well to retain copies.

Notice is sent to all subscribers whose payment (in advance) is exhausted. The paper will be discontinued where the Subscription is not renewed. We again remind those who are disappointed in obtaining back numbers that, although the music is always kept in stock, only a sufficient quantity of the rest of the paper is printed to supply the current sale.

RUTH

A HARVEST PASTORAL

SUITABLE FOR USE IN PLACES OF WORSHIP

WORDS BY

EDWARD OXENFORD

MUSIC BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

SUITABLE FOR

THANKSGIVING SERVICES.

"The Biblical story of which Ruth is the central figure lends itself with remarkable suitability to an illustration of a harvest celebration. The country landscape, the ripened corn, the sturdy reapers, the standing sheaves, the active gleaners, and the busy farmer, all combine to fill the mind's eye with a pleasant scene of excitement. Set to music by a competent composer such as Mr. A. R. Gaul, the narrative of Ruth's eventful episode lends itself to a pathetic, picturesque, and pleasant performance. The bereaved and sorrowful trio of women on whom the calamity of poverty and famine has fallen, as if to give intensity to their greater grief, and the unexpected and happy influence of patriarchal benevolence displayed by the mighty Boaz, who so quickly transforms sorrow into joy, are all introduced and aptly take their allotted place in the melodious music of Gaul's interpretation of the tale."—Gloucester Citizen.

THE ROLLING SEASONS.

A New Harvest Cantata. By CALEB SIMPER.

5th 1,000. Price 1s. 6d. net. Tonic Sol-fa, 1s. net.

Band Parts are also printed for Strings, Flute, Oboe, Clarinet, Bassoon 2 Horns, 2 Cornets, 2 Trombones, Timpani, and Organ.

With the exception of two Hymns and a Carol, the words are selected from the Holy Scriptures. The music, both Vocal and Instrumental, is attractive, interesting, and not difficult. It requires Four Soloists and Full Chorus, and occupies 35 minutes in performance. This Cantata may be rendered with Organ Accompaniment only, but the Orchestral Parts add greatly to the effect. It is especially suitable for Church use at Harvest-tide.

This favourite Cantata has already been performed with great success in England, Scotland, Ireland, Wales, Channel Islands, America, Australia, Cape Colony, &c. A list of "Opinions" from the Clergy and Conductors may be obtained of the Publishers.

A HANDBOOK OF EXAMINATIONS IN MUSIC
CONTAINING
600 QUESTIONS WITH ANSWERS
BY
ERNEST A. DICKS,
Fellow of the Royal College of Organists, Member of the Incorporated Society of Musicians, &c.

The scope of this book covers the whole ground of theoretical examinations in music. It supplies an invaluable equipment to candidates entering for the various Local Examinations in Musical Knowledge held periodically throughout the country, and it will be found extremely useful to those who are preparing for the higher grades of Diploma and Degree Examinations.

The book is therefore very comprehensive. Its range includes questions and answers in Theory, Harmony, Counterpoint, Form, Fugue, Acoustics, Musical History, Organ Construction, and Choir Training.

By no means the least valuable part of the volume is that section, consisting of upwards of one hundred pages, which contains reprints of past examination papers set by the Associated Board, Trinity College, and the Incorporated Society of Musicians; the Universities of Oxford, Cambridge, Dublin, and Durham; The Royal Academy of Music, The Royal College of Music, and The Royal College of Organists. The advantage of having so many specimens of these actual examination papers within one cover is too obvious to need further comment or commendation.

TWO PIECES (Posthumous) FOR THE ORGAN

COMPOSED BY

F. MENDELSSOHN BARTHOLDY.

Price Two Shillings net.

PREFACE.

Mendelssohn composed his "Six Organ Sonatas" at the request of Messrs. Coventry and Hollier, Music Publishers (then carrying on business at 71, Dean Street, Soho), acting upon the initiative of some English organists who were familiar with his masterly performances on the organ in London and Birmingham. In a letter written to his publishers in London, and dated Frankfort, December 17, 1844, Mendelssohn says (in English): "I hope to send you soon the promised organ pieces. Nine are ready, but I want to have twelve before I make a parcel of them."

The two pieces forming the present publication have been selected from those that remained unpublished of the "parcel" referred to by Mendelssohn. They are now printed for the first time from the original manuscripts preserved in the Royal Library at Berlin.

In preparing these two pieces for publication, expression marks, metronomic rates, and stop registration have been suggested, there being no such directions in the original autographs.

CONNLA

A DRAMATIC CANTATA

THE WORDS WRITTEN BY

JAMES SMIETON, M.A.

THE MUSIC COMPOSED FOR

THREE SOLO VOICES, CHORUS, & ORCHESTRA

BY

JOHN MORE SMIETON.

Vocal Score, 2s. 6d.
Full Score and Band Parts on hire.

(The work takes about eighty minutes to perform, and is adapted for Festival and the larger Choral Societies.)

"Space prevents us from noticing in detail this interesting work. The music, in which Scandinavian influence is perceptible, is fresh and imaginative. There is a great variety of rhythm; and the epithet 'dramatic' in the title is quite appropriate."—The Musical Times.

"A new work of real power and grit is John More Smieton's Cantata 'Connla.' . . . The music flows natural and transparent, as do the words; and, taken altogether, the work is admirable in the arrangement of its matter and the clearness of its treatment. Conductors and choirmasters should not fail to procure copies of this new and distinctly notable production."—Musical Opinion.

IN

COMPOSED BY

MOZART.

EDITED, WITH MARKS OF EXPRESSION AND PHRASING,

BY

ALBERTO RANDEGGER.

PREFACE.

Mozart's keen appreciation of the subtleties of the words he set to music is often so evident that, without a thorough understanding of their significance, it would be impossible to sing the music—to the spirit of which the words are closely allied—in strict accordance with the composer's intention.

With a view to meeting this difficulty a special English version has been adapted, to express, as nearly as possible, the literal meaning of the original Italian text.

In these translations no attempt has been made at versification, and they do not claim any literary merit, but they may be used in singing the songs, if desired.

In any case they will prove valuable to singers who are not familiar with the Italian language.

The alterations, cadences, &c., added in small type over the original music, are used by many eminent artists. The Editor, however, does not hold himself responsible for them, and leaves their adoption or rejection to the taste and discretion of the singer.

"The Virgil Piano School has just completed a course of four months, in which a number of children have been taught strictly according to the principles of the Virgil School, under the control of a committee of experts. The Virgil Method aims at a complete separation of the technical training from the tuition of the purely musical element, the technical exercises being performed on an extraordinarily ingeniously constructed toneless Clavier. Should this principle at the first moment appear doubtful, all objections are victoriously crushed by the brilliant results which the Virgil Piano School showed in the examination. It was particularly astounding to witness how children, who had not touched a key before, and had only practised on the toneless keyboard for four months, now produced at once an unusually even touch on the sounding pianoforte keyboard."—Berliner Lokal-Anzeiger, June 17, 1898.

MR. CHARLES KNOWLES

(YORKSHIRE BARITONE)

Of the Crystal Palace, Leeds Choral Union, Glasgow and principal Provincial Concerts;
Principal Baritone, Leeds Amateur Operatic Society, 1897-98.
Oratorios, Cantatas, Ballad or Operatic Concerts.

"ST. PAUL."—WEDNESBURY CHORAL SOCIETY.—"The success of the evening was centred in Mr. Charles Knowles, who, we believe, has never been heard in Wednesbury before, but who created an excellent impression some time ago at Walsall. He comes from Yorkshire and possesses all the manly actions and the vigorous style which characterise the Northerner, whilst his singing on this occasion was of high order, so much so that he aroused his audience from coldness to the highest enthusiasm. In the spirited parts he gave them with fine attack and in grand style, while in the subdued music he was equally successful, and showed that he was not without the spirit of an artist."—Midland Advertiser, May 7, 1898.

GRAUN'S "PASSION" MUSIC, LEEDS.—"Mr. Charles Knowles was excellent in the bass solos and gave a particularly vigorous reading of the fine air 'As stands a lofty mountain.'"—Yorkshire Post, April 2, 1898.

BARNSLEY ST. CECILIA SOCIETY.—GOUNOD'S "FAUST."—"We have not heard Mr. Charles Knowles before last evening, but his admirable rendering of the by no means easy music scored for Valentine, stamped him as a singer of whom Leeds has no need to be ashamed. He sang with confidence, excellent style, was certain of his higher notes, and was by no means devoid of the intensity of passion which is almost inseparable from the part. The death scene was undoubtedly his best effort."—Sheffield Independent.

SAINT-SAËNS'S "SAMSON AND DELILAH."—LEEDS CHORAL UNION.—"Mr. Charles Knowles sustained a dual rôle in a style to show the rapid progress he has made of late. His singing throughout was to the point and clever."—Leeds Mercury, November 4, 1897.

"Mr. Charles Knowles's assumption of Abimelech and the Aged Hebrew was marked by sterling excellence."—Leeds Express, November 4, 1897.

Booking for next season. For terms, &c., apply, 61, Burley Street, Leeds; or, Mr. N. Vert, 6, Cork St., Burlington Gardens, London, W.

MR.

ERNEST WADDINGTON

(BARITONE)

Oratorios, Concerts, &c.

"But the feature of the evening was undoubtedly Mr. Ernest Waddington's magnificent rendering of the superb air 'Why do the nations.' In this song Mr. Waddington fairly excelled himself, the remarkable flexibility of his splendid voice being so eminently suited to Handelian songs."—Hull Daily News.

For terms, &c., address, Messrs. W. B. Healey and Son, 17, Great Marlborough Street, W.; or, 30, Silver Street, Hull.

MR. CHARLES WALTON

(BARITONE)

(Pupil of Andrew Black, Esq.)

"A very fine voice, splendidly developed. This, combined with great capacity, should give excellent results in the future."—Andrew Black.

THE MUSICAL TIMES
AND SINGING-CLASS CIRCULAR.
SEPTEMBER 1, 1898.

ALFRED JAMES HIPKINS.

NOT the least interesting feature characterising the progress of music during the Victorian Era is that associated with the literature of the art. Admirable books, valuable dictionary and magazine articles, pamphlets, papers, &c., have been written by able men who, by devoting themselves to some definite branch of study, have become specialists in their own particular spheres of work. The name of one such expert, claiming particular recognition, is that of Mr. A. J. Hipkins, the greatest authority in this country—if not in the wide world—on the pianoforte and its precursors. "Ask Mr. Hipkins," is the natural reply to anyone seeking information on difficult matters connected with the domestic instrument and its forbears. Moreover, it may safely be added that his knowledge of the subject is not only encyclopædic, but absolutely reliable in everything appertaining to the history and construction of all keyboard instruments, and much more besides.

Alfred James Hipkins was born at Westminster, June 17, 1826. His earliest years were spent within sound of the Abbey bells. When his school period was over he wanted to be a painter, but his father demurred, thinking it would be better for him to learn to tune pianos so that he might have a dependable calling. The Fine Arts were therefore put aside on the understanding that they might be again considered when he was seventeen. Mr. Henry Fowler Broadwood took the boy into his factory at Westminster before he was fourteen. Therefore, Mr. Hipkins has served the great house of Broadwood for the remarkable period of fifty-eight years! Hitherto music had not been thought of except as a casual source of pleasure; but having the keyboard constantly under his hands, it followed as a matter of course that he should learn to play the pianoforte. At first he had no regular tuition, but with the aid of Cramer's Instruction Book he acquired the twenty-four major and minor scales. Early in 1841 he began a course of lessons with a Mr. Fentum, who kept a music shop in the Strand. Fentum also played the flute at the old Opera-house in the Haymarket, then still existing with a Pit and Fops Alley, and the Omnibus Box. At the end of three months young Hipkins accompanied Flautist Fentum in his solos and he took part in a pianoforte duet at one of his teacher's "at homes"; whereupon his lessons ceased. Thenceforward he was self-taught. Through Fentum, who was very kind to him, the boy went to the Opera, where he heard Rubini, Grisi, and Lablache in "Anna Bolena." To this day he remembers the exquisite cantilena of Rubini in the slow part of "Vivi tu," which, by an otherwise cold audience (as it seemed to him), was rapturously encored.

THE ABBEY AND EARLY STUDIES.

An important influence on his musical training surrounded him during the impressionable years from fourteen to eighteen. He regularly attended the two Sunday services at Westminster Abbey in the days of James Turle's organistship, whereby he became familiar with the noble Cathedral music of Gibbons and Purcell, "the brightest stars in the brilliant firmament of our national music of that period," to use his words. At the same time he persevered in his studies of Handel, and, a little later, Bach, which gave him a solid and lasting foundation.

In 1844 Mr. Hipkins began the study of the organ under the late Marcellus Higgs, with whom he remained for a year. There were no examinations in those days, and alphabetical appendages to organists' names were almost unknown. Following the custom of the period, the young organist obtained his "testimonials," chiefly through playing Bach, from James Turle, J. B. Sale, George Sale, T. Forbes Walmisley, J. L. Brownsmith, and Henry Boys. Mr. Hipkins became assistant-organist to the last-named and Sunday-evening organist at St. Mark's, North Audley Street. But his serious views on organ playing were not appreciated by the congregation, and rather than adopt a lighter style that was uncongenial to him, he resigned at the end of six months. Thus ended his career as an organist. But he began to take an increased interest in Bach, which developed into a profound veneration of the Leipzig Cantor's music that will remain steadfast till life's journey is ended.

TUNING AND EQUAL TEMPERAMENT.

To return to the work-a-day life at Broadwood's factory. He soon acquired a knowledge of tuning. But finding no satisfaction in the attempts being made by tuners to relinquish what passed for the old Meantone system of tuning, Mr. Hipkins turned to an edition of Dr. Crotch's "Harmony" containing an Appendix which supplied an explanation of Equal Temperament. This gave him information which he soon turned to practical account. In 1844 he was transferred to the Great Pulteney Street warehouse, where he quietly persevered with his studies in Equal Temperament. Two years later Mr. Walter Broadwood, in studying practical tuning, observed the innovation; and, recognising the value of a system which had been but little used in this country up to that time, he set the young innovator of twenty summers to teach the tuners in the Great Pulteney Street showrooms and at the Horseferry Road factory. This was a task not free from difficulty, as in some instances young Hipkins had to instruct or re-teach those who had in the first instance taught him! From that time Equal Temperament was definitely established in the leading house of the English pianoforte trade. But some years passed before it came into general use, especially in organs, though the Exeter Hall organ, by Walker, was so tuned in 1848, when Costa became conductor of the Sacred Harmonic Society. All the English organs in the Great Exhibition of 1851 were unequally tuned. Mr. Hipkins acted as interpreter to Fétis during his visit to the musical instrument section of the great glass palace in Hyde Park. He well remembers the warm argument which took place between Fétis, who advocated Equal Temperament, and Mr. Henry Willis, who defended the unequal temperament of the great organ which brought him so much fame in the Exhibition. Mr. Hipkins's occupation as a practical tuner had, however, before this time ended. But, as we shall see, not theoretically.

PITCH.

In 1855 Mr. Hipkins began to collect tuning-forks to record pitch, the date of these forks being known. Copies of three were sent to the French Commission in Paris, 1858, and also to the Society of Arts in the following year. In 1876 Mr. Greaves, the tuning-fork maker of Sheffield, introduced Mr. Hipkins to the late Alexander J. Ellis, who was then experimenting with Appun's Tonometer at South Kensington, as a means of determining vibration numbers. Ellis welcomed Mr. Hipkins as an authority he had hitherto been seeking on the subject of pitch; and from that time until Dr. Ellis's death, fourteen years later, they worked together. Dr. Ellis generously acknowledged over and over again the help he received from his colleague, in his "History of Musical Pitch" (1880), "Musical Scales of Various Nations" (1885), and the second edition of his translation of the great work of Helmholtz in the same year. Dr. Ellis took the warmest interest in Mr. Hipkins's lectures and publications. Moreover, he made him his literary executor, and bequeathed him all the materials that he had used in carrying out his musical-acoustic work. This collection Mr. Hipkins has recently handed over to the Royal Institution.

THE FRENCH PITCH.

The revived discussion on the vexed question of the adoption of the French pitch (Le Diapason Normal) in this country, which led to its acceptance as a standard of pitch at the Queen's Hall, and particularly by the Philharmonic Society, in 1896, caused Mr. Hipkins to be asked by the Society of Arts to read a paper on "Standards of Musical Pitch." This discourse was printed in the Society's Journal and a silver medal awarded him. Difficulties as to a mean performing pitch, and the fact that the Philharmonic Society had no standard of its own (or ever had one), prompted definite action in the matter. A sub-committee of the Directors was formed, including Mr. W. H. Cummings and Mr. Charles Gardner, which Mr. Hipkins was invited to join. The result was the adoption of a fork he had recommended in his Lecture, tuned to A 439 at a temperature of 68 degrees, instead of the normal A 435, adapted for 59 degrees Fahrenheit. The vibration number was verified by him, and large forks on resonance boxes, made by Messrs. Valantine and Carr, of Sheffield, were sent to the leading musical institutions, one being retained by the Society.

LITERARY AVOCATIONS.

Mr. Hipkins is not the only one who has drifted into the pleasant occupation of cacoethes scribendi by the force of circumstances. In 1861 his friend Ernst Pauer gave a course of historical performances, using a harpsichord for the due presentation of the old English Virginal composers. In the following year he decided to continue these performances with the addition of a written commentary, or analysis, combined with biographies of the composers, and occasional essays bearing on the works performed. In order to carry out this scheme he enlisted Mr. Hipkins's collaboration, and their joint efforts were continued in further series during the years 1863 and 1867. As editor of these programmes Mr. Hipkins was brought into relation with Mr. (now Sir) George Grove. In one of Mr. Pauer's programme-books Sir George wrote an eloquent appreciation of Robert Schumann, which proved to be epoch-making as a fervent appeal for reconsideration and toleration of a composer at that time banned by the critics. This connection brought about a closer intimacy, with the result that when Sir George Grove, in 1874, laid the foundation of his famous "Dictionary of Music and Musicians," he persuaded Mr. Hipkins to join his staff of contributors. At the completion of this important work, in 1889, the Index revealed the fact that 134 articles and paragraphs bore the initials "A. J. H." As might naturally be supposed, the most important of these was the long article upon the Pianoforte.

Mr. Hipkins considered it to be his duty to vindicate the just claim made for the Italian Cristofori as the inventor of the pianoforte, and to prove that the German Schroeter had no valid grounds for being so regarded. The pianofortes in the palaces at Potsdam, acquired by Frederick the Great from the maker, Silbermann, had long been affirmed to be copied from Schroeter's invention, and with such confidence that it never occurred to anyone, even in Germany, to examine the instruments to prove the truth of this statement. Moreover, it was said that the official routine of these Royal palaces was opposed to such an examination. However true this might be, any difficulty was overcome by an introduction to the Crown Princess (now the Empress Frederick), obtained through Dean Stanley, whereby Mr. Hipkins was enabled to have the pianoforte described by Burney examined. A drawing was made of the action, which revealed the complete mechanism of Cristofori! This discovery of course appeared in "Grove." Subsequently, in 1881, armed with full powers from the Crown Princess to visit all the palaces in Berlin, Charlottenburg, and Potsdam, Mr. Hipkins went himself, and with most important results. He examined the three Silbermann grand pianofortes preserved in the respective music rooms of the three palaces at Potsdam; upon one of these, that in the Stadtschloss, there can be no doubt J. S. Bach played, the date being the 7th of April, 1747, according to information supplied to Sir George Grove by Thomas Carlyle. In all three instruments there is the same mechanical construction, that of Cristofori, adopted unaltered by Silbermann.

When Messrs. A. & C. Black invited Mr. Hipkins to write on the subject of the Pianoforte, in addition to other articles, in the ninth edition of the "Encyclopædia Britannica," he was glad of another channel for the publication of the above important fact—a fact that made possible a continuous history of the pianoforte, instead of a mere string of disconnected anecdotes. Mr. Hipkins had the honour to be one of the hundred contributors to the "Encyclopædia Britannica" invited to dine at Christ's College, Cambridge, under the presidency of the then chief editor, the late Robertson Smith. It was on that occasion that Mr. Adam Black, in responding to the toast of the evening, mentioned the remarkable fact that the corrections of that great work had cost more than double the setting-up (in type) of the manuscript.

One thing leads to another. Messrs. Black regarded the Loan Collection of the Inventions Exhibition of 1885 (with which Mr. Hipkins had so much to do) as a fine opportunity for the production of a masterpiece in illustration. They engaged Mr. Hipkins to control the selection and write the book, and commissioned Mr. William Gibb, an artist of great merit, to undertake the illustrations of the treasures exhibited. And thus appeared "Musical Instruments, Historic, Rare, and Unique," published at seven (and fifteen) guineas, in January, 1888. This work remains unapproached of its kind.

Mr. Hipkins has written many reviews, more particularly of books dealing with musical ethnology or antiquity, in the Athenæum, The Musical Times, and elsewhere; also articles in the Hobby Horse, one of which, "On the music of the angels, as shown in paintings in the National Gallery," is worth reprinting. His latest book, published in 1896 (second edition, 1897), is No. 52 of Novello's Primers, entitled "A description and history of the Pianoforte and of the older keyboard stringed instruments." It is based upon the author's lectures. The first part of the Primer consists of the informal talks he gave to students of the Royal College of Music (of which Institution he is the Honorary Curator), who were desirous of knowing something about the inside of a pianoforte. The woodcuts, by his son, Mr. John Hipkins, are fine specimens of the neglected art of wood-engraving.

Lecturer.

As a lecturer on music Mr. Hipkins has attained well-merited distinction. He not only has always something interesting to say, but also the gift of expressing his thoughts in an interesting and lucid manner. His lecture on the construction of the Pianoforte, read before the Society of Arts in March, 1883, brought him the honour of another silver medal from the Society. This lecture was afterwards published by request, and with illustrations, in the English Illustrated Magazine for January, 1884. Reversing the practice of lecturers on music, Mr. Hipkins gives his entire attention to the musical illustrations, which he plays himself, and secures the aid of a friend to read his discourses. Those who have thus assisted him by publicly reading his lectures have been Dr. A. J. Ellis, Sir George Grove, Sir Henry Trueman Wood, Mr. H. B. Wheatley, Mr. W. H. Cummings, Dr. Turpin, Mr. W. H. Hadow, and Professor Sedley Taylor. Mr. Hipkins has lectured at the Society of Arts, the Musical Association, The Royal College of Organists, the Incorporated Society of Musicians, the Royal College of Music, the Royal Academy of Music, and the Musical Clubs of Oxford and Cambridge. In 1891 he gave the Cantor Lectures (three) at the Society of Arts on "Musical Instruments of all kinds," which were subsequently published by the Society. Many of his other lectures have been issued in periodical publications and reprinted in America; they have also been translated into French and German, and, in part, into Italian.

Mr. Hipkins assisted Dr. Ellis in preparing his lecture on "The Musical Scales of various nations," now unfortunately out of print. Finding that musical scales were only to be accurately measured with tuning-forks, they examined the instruments of the Javanese musicians at the Aquarium, in 1882; the Japanese at Knightsbridge, in 1883; the Chinese at the Health Exhibition, in 1884, and the Siamese at the Inventions Exhibition, in 1885. The Highland Bagpipe scale, taken down from his friend Charles Keene, the famous Punch artist, was not the least interesting of these examples of non-harmonic scales. The result of these investigations was a paper entitled "Non-harmonic scales," printed in their joint names in the Proceedings of the Royal Society, 1884. This, by the way, is not Mr. Hipkins's only appearance before the first of our learned Societies, two papers by him, "Observations on the Harmonics (upper partial tones) of a Pianoforte string," having previously been contributed and printed in the Proceedings. Mr. Hipkins was admitted a Fellow of the Society of Antiquaries in 1886.

EXHIBITION EXPERIENCES.

The Great Exhibition of 1851 made the subject of this sketch, Mr. Hipkins, in a way, a public performer. Every Friday and Saturday he gave a recital in that bright and gay building upon Broadwood's pianoforte. He made a friend in the late Miss Sophy Horsley, the friend of Mendelssohn and other great musicians, who was attracted by hearing him play Chopin's "Andante Spianato," at that time unknown in this country, but which he had had the good fortune to learn from hearing the composer play it frequently. He also became acquainted with the late W. T. Best. Amongst the jurors he admired the intellectual look of Berlioz and the noble bearing of Thalberg. In 1883 the Prince of Wales, through Sir Philip Cunliffe Owen, requested Mr. Hipkins to undertake the formation of the Loan Collection section of the Inventions and Music Exhibition, at South Kensington, of 1885. He became chairman of the sub-committee and rendered invaluable service in the successful carrying out of this most interesting feature. This great show, with Mr. Donaldson's Historic Rooms and the lovely pianofortes designed by Mr. Alma Tadema and the late Sir Edward Burne-Jones, formed a basis for the still larger and more wonderful Music and Drama Exhibition at Vienna in 1892, of the British section of which, at the request of the Duke of Edinburgh, Mr. Hipkins was one of the two honorary secretaries. In addition to the receipt of a gold medal for his important share in the Inventions Exhibition, he received special marks of favour from the Duke of Edinburgh for that at Vienna. Those who are familiar with Mr. Hipkins's expert knowledge, unique capabilities, and organising zeal will not be surprised to hear that he has been placed on the Musical Instrument Committee for the Paris Exhibition to be held in 1900, where, as heretofore, he will assuredly be the right man in the right place.

CLAVICHORD AND HARPSICHORD EXPERT.

Since the death of the late Carl Engel (in 1882) there is no one in England who knows more about the old keyboard instruments than Mr. Hipkins. Without Carl Engel it is quite possible that the clavichord would not have been resuscitated. He had four in his private collection, and they were kept in playable order. When Mr. Hipkins began his work on the "Dictionary of Music and Musicians," it was a question which keyboard instrument he would treat first. The clavichord was chosen. Carl Engel lent him his best instrument for two or three years, and the borrower had the pleasure of showing it to Hans von Bülow, Charles Hallé, and Madame Schumann, not one of whom had ever seen a clavichord before. Mr. Hipkins divined that the Fantasia Cromatica of J. S. Bach was composed for this instrument tuned in Equal Temperament, the chord of the minor ninth, on which this most beautiful composition and the fugue are based, being only endurable to the ear when so tuned. He had never previously studied the work on the pianoforte. He therefore began it on the clavichord, hoping from the suggestion of the instrument, the internal evidence in the composition, and the comparison of the oldest copies read by the light of Carl Philipp Emanuel Bach's "Versuch," to get at an interpretation that might have some claim to follow the composer's treatment, though, of course, unsupported by any traditions, of which none exist. The result has been that his interpretation of the work on the gentle clavichord has always been highly successful. He believes that this musical poem has met with an appreciation when played on the clavichord far exceeding that which it usually meets with when performed on the pianoforte.

"Both Fantasia and Fugue," he says, "are as clear as the stem, branch, and twig skeleton of a tree in winter"; few, if any, of those who have been privileged to hear Mr. Hipkins's skilful interpretation of this masterpiece will fail to endorse his opinion.

The harpsichord was already known. One had been used by Moscheles at his historical recitals in London, and one by Ernst Pauer. The veteran, Charles Salaman, had also shown its amenity to his own beautiful touch. Mr. Hipkins's particular concern was with figuration and the graces, and experimentally with the treatment of the two keyboards. These had not been elucidated, and, as in the instance of Scarlatti's overhand skips, had been misunderstood. To get at the root of the matter he went to Bach's Goldberg Variations, which show that the two keyboards, with nearly equal registration, can be ingeniously used with every variety of device. He played all the two-keyboard variations in his later lectures, with the galantly treated Aria, of course, and the Quodlibet. It is almost certain that they were never played on a harpsichord before in this country.

NOTABILITIES HE HAS MET.

During his long career Mr. Hipkins has met with many distinguished people in the world of music. He saw Mendelssohn conduct one of the performances of his "Elijah" at Exeter Hall, in 1847. In the following year the French Revolution drove Frédéric Chopin to this country, who, in the words of Mr. Hipkins, "was a pianist of the greatest charm and sweetest sorrow that ever touched a keyboard, and an improviser such as could be dreamed of only after hearing his beautiful compositions sympathetically played." At that time Chopin's works were scarcely known. Chorley was the only one of the London critics who appreciated him. But while Mr. J. W. Davison, the great critic of The Times, was not insensible to Chopin's extraordinary genius and personal attraction, he seems to have dreaded him as a dangerous rival to Mendelssohn. Davison, himself an attractive and fascinating man, used to say: "Hipkins is not a bad sort of fellow, but he will like Chopin!" The great critic, who habitually turned night into day, acknowledged that Chopin touched those whose temperaments were submissive to reverie. Mr. Hipkins was present when Chopin, attended by his devoted friend and pupil, Miss Stirling, played his recently composed but now popular waltzes in D flat and C sharp minor to Mr. Frederick Beale (of Cramer and Co.), the publisher of them in England. When Liszt, in 1886, called on Mr. Hipkins in Great Pulteney Street, he exclaimed: "I remember entering this room sixty years ago!" Then he spoke in French. His early familiarity with English revived when Mr. Hipkins met him at a dinner party at the Langham Hotel. He told an anecdote to the effect that his father took him when a boy to a phrenologist and said: "He is a very stupid boy and will not apply himself to anything." The phrenologist, feeling the boy's head, said: "I don't think he is such a stupid boy—let him try music!"

In his early days Mr. Hipkins received much encouragement from Sterndale Bennett, whose playing he had frequent opportunities of hearing, making him his model as an interpreter of Beethoven and Mendelssohn. He first met Wagner during his visit to London in 1855. In 1877 he heard him bang a chord or two on the pianoforte—an instrument it would seem, from his correspondence with Liszt, that he could never do without, and yet never learned to play properly.

It is interesting to learn that Mr. Hipkins was one of the earliest disciples of Wagner in London. He became attached to the cult in 1866, not from admiration—that came later and is now a passion—but from the feeling that Wagner was being condemned in England unheard. A photographic group, taken in 1868, shows the few adherents Wagner then had in London. Karl Klindworth, then busy with the pianoforte score of the "Nibelungen Ring," and who had been playing extracts from it week by week to Walter Bache, Edward Dannreuther, Frits Hartvigson, the painter Kümpel, and "Hip," as his friends called the subject of this biographical sketch—these six enthusiasts form the friendly circle represented in the photograph. Except for Praeger, who fought alone, there was no one else to champion Wagner's cause.

The name of Rubinstein recalls a pleasant incident. When Mr. Hipkins read his paper on "The old clavier, or keyboard instruments," before the Musical Association, June 7, 1886, Rubinstein not only favoured the meeting by his presence, but insisted upon turning over the leaves of the music for the lecturer, who will never forget the extraordinary friendliness and kindness of the great pianist in rendering this humble service. Although Rubinstein was then fifty-five, he had never before seen or heard a clavichord!

HIS OLD-WORLD INSTRUMENTS.

An inspection of Mr. Hipkins's old instruments in his house at Kensington, under the guidance of their learned possessor, is of great interest. First, there is a double harpsichord by Jacob and Abraham Kirkman, A.D. 1773, which formerly belonged to Carl Engel. It is one of the finest specimens of its kind. To listen to its beautiful, rich, and varied tone, as Mr. Hipkins skilfully plays one piece after another, carries one back in imagination to those old-world days when the soul of music was tranquillity and simplicity. Then there is a clavichord, made about the middle of the last century, the gift of Carl Engel, to whom it also formerly belonged. Of special interest, on account of its having originally belonged to Handel, is a spinet by John Hitchcock, made in the first years of the eighteenth century. Handel gave it to a friend of his named Leamon (or Lehmann), who settled at King's Lynn, or Downham Market, in Norfolk. Mr. Hipkins bought it from the descendants of this Leamon with documentary evidence as to its history, &c. A woodcut of it by Mr. John Hipkins appears in his father's "History of the Pianoforte" Primer.

The centre of attraction, by reason of its novelty and rarity, is a very fine Regal, the only known large Regal in this country, which Mr. Hipkins acquired at Innsbruck. The keys are of bird's-eye maple, and the instrument is arranged, ab initio, for the "short octave." There is an inscription written upon it, prompted by a great trouble which a former owner had evidently gone through, probably during the Thirty Years' War. The date of the inscription is 1629; but the instrument may be some years older, but not anterior to 1530, when the beating reed was introduced into the organ. It is no wonder that the late Sir Edward Burne-Jones was "much gone" on this old Regal. He is not the only one who has had similar feelings arising from an inspection of this treasure.

Amongst other valuables is a splendid lute of rare excellence and beauty which Carl Engel used to play, also a set of Northumbrian bagpipes bequeathed to Mr. Hipkins by his friend Charles Keene, of Punch, and the inimitable artist's stockhorn, very rare. And then there is a holograph letter from Beethoven to his friend Ferdinand Ries, in London. This interesting epistle, which relates to the great Pianoforte Sonata in B flat (Op. 106), appeared in The Musical Times for May, 1896.

At Home.

An afternoon set apart by Mr. and Mrs. Hipkins to receive their friends is in pleasant contrast to the conventional "At Home"—so-called. The warm welcome which each visitor receives is consonant with the simple home-life of host and hostess. While we are examining and listening to the old instruments, Mr. Henschel, with his big dog, drops in. He naturally gravitates towards the ancient Regal, and, sitting down thereat, he accompanies himself in some solemn strain, the deep tones of his fine voice blending perfectly with those of the old instrument, to the accompaniment of which many a monk has doubtless sung chant and psalm. Two sisters of the host's old friend, the late Walter Bache, are sympathetic listeners. And when the little company gather around the table for tea—not the "four o'clock" apology for that old-fashioned meal—an interesting addition to the friendly circle is no less a personage than Professor Karl Klindworth.

Intimate friends will bear ample testimony—if, indeed, such testimony be needed, even by casual observers—to the delightful charm of the family life which characterises Mr. Hipkins's home. Mrs. Hipkins not only evinces a keen interest in the artistic pursuits of her husband and children, but shows it in a very practical way by blowing the bellows of the Regal with an expert skill worthy of "honours" in an examination! The exceptional gifts of their son, Mr. John Hipkins, in the art of wood-engraving have already been mentioned. Miss Edith Hipkins, their artist-daughter, has recently distinguished herself in the excellent portrait of her esteemed father, which was honoured with a place in this year's Exhibition of the Royal Academy. A photographic reproduction of this picture forms an appropriate supplement to this biographical sketch of her father. It represents Mr. Hipkins in the act of playing Bach's Goldberg variations on the double harpsichord.

In regard to the genial personality of the living original of this portrait, much might be said. The friendly grip of the hand, the kindly light in the eye, and the benevolent expression of the countenance are true indexes of the warm heart that beats within the breast of Alfred James Hipkins.

SOME RECOLLECTIONS.

III.

A Musical Tramp.

At the close of my first paper, "A Mainzer Class," I mentioned that Mr. James Watts carried on his Berkeley enterprise for some time after the discouraged majority of his pupils had abandoned him. In point of fact, he worked up two or three concerts, of a sort, and endeavoured, for further progress, to enrol under his banner the instrumentalists who formed the band at the Congregational Chapel. It is usual to assume the worst with regard to such performers. They are impartially credited with making dreadful noises and with being no less incompetent than conceited. Only the other day, a bishop of the Anglican Church took up his parable to this effect, enlarging with much unction upon past inefficiency and present skill. But sweeping statements are nearly always unjust, and, in this case, I can bear witness to the fact that there is a good deal to be said on the other side. When I first knew the chapel band which, as will presently be seen, Mr. Watts unskilfully wooed, it made very good music indeed. Among its members were the father and brother of Miss Tremearn, a Cornish violin "prodigy" of sufficient note in her day to play before the then youthful Queen Victoria. Both men were capital performers, judged by an amateur standard, and equal to them was a viola player named Sturge—a member of a musical family once well known in Bristol. The others being hardly less efficient, our Mainzer professor was quite right in trying to enlist the services of the entire company. Unhappily he went the wrong way to work. Instead of negotiating the band into line, he curtly announced, at the beginning of his last season, that he "had vacancies" for such and such instruments, naming precisely the number and kind which the chapel band possessed. This procedure did not do at all. No response was vouchsafed by the proud instrumentalists, and the choral society—late the Mainzer class—went on to a speedy end.

The foregoing particulars offer occasion for some recollections of the curious prominence given to instrumental music in the valley of the lower Severn fifty years ago. I do not claim for that prominence that it was in any degree singular. Most likely the district which came under my notice had its counterpart everywhere in the rural West, but I can speak only of what I know, and assuredly it is true that the market towns and many of the villages between the Cotswolds and the river could boast of instrumentalists competent not only to the simple devotional music of church and chapel, but also to the more or less successful practice of far higher things. In Berkeley, for example, at a somewhat later time than that which I have chiefly in mind, the local players rose to the height of a concert wholly devoted to instrumental chamber music; the leading violin being held by him who now records the fact. A similar body answered for the art life of Thornbury, in which town some years of my youth were spent. The Thornburian musicians had two strings to their bow; playing once a week at the meetings of the choral society, and as often in their own practice of instrumental works. I suggest that the giving up of two evenings out of six is a fair proof of earnestness in the cause of music. In that band I played a viola, and can testify to the zest and spirit, to the single-minded devotion and self-sacrifice with which the rural musicians did their work. We were a typical company of the period; uniform in our love of music, motley in all things else. Social divisions and religious distinctions being ignored, the gentleman wielded a bow by the side of the hedge carpenter, the beer-shop keeper sat at the same desk with the church member, and the rigid Nonconformist rubbed elbows with the zealous supporters of Anglicanism. All points of difference were fused by the fire of music; when the art spoke clamouring voices hushed themselves, even though, as on one occasion, a furiously contested parliamentary election ran its embittered course.

The reader naturally wants to know what kind of music the Thornbury amateurs studied. In relation to the choral society, they shared the task imposed by selections from oratorios, chiefly those of Handel; as an independent body their energies were devoted to a collection of more or less antique works, largely inherited from predecessors who had played their way to dusty death and left the books behind. Printed music was then excessively high in price—so high that, to a company of poor men, it was almost prohibitory. Yet somehow copies accumulated, and, in my time, there was a very fair choice. I can call to mind many of the compositions at which we laboured, among them an arrangement for strings, flute, and pianoforte of the Salomon Symphonies; Geminiani's arrangement of Corelli's Trios; the Sinfonias and other instrumental pieces of Sebastian Bach; and Overtures by Handel and Mozart. All these of course still live, but in the forties not a few works, since dead, had certain remains of vitality. Who, nowadays, ever hears Dr. Arne's once famous Overture to "Artaxerxes," or Kreitzel's "Lodoiska," or, for that matter, Mozart's Preludes to "La Clemenza di Tito" and "Idomeneo," with many another? Yet in the days of which I speak—days, as I look back upon them, full of keener delights and more joyous enthusiasms than any I have since known—these works were played so often that they remain in my memory almost to the last detail. May I suggest that such music-making was, all things considered, not bad for a town of a thousand inhabitants, before the great artistic resurrection of England began, and when for every hundred present opportunities of improvement in taste and skill there did not exist half-a-dozen. As regards the execution of the works named above, and others like them, the Thornbury musicians were not without guides. The leader, Mr. Pearce (organist of the parish church), was a well-read and intelligent chief, and the band included a gentleman, Mr. Player, whose means enabled him to gather experience of the best works and performances of the day. To him I confess myself largely indebted for many hints and no little of the encouragement after which aspiring youth hungers and thirsts.

The band met for practice in the Town Hall, an apartment which, as far as I remember, was rarely used for any other purpose. There on one occasion we had an interesting visitor. We were busy with the Overture to "Figaro," and had just reached its last chord, when, from out of the gloom at the far end of the hall came a voice saying, with a strong German accent: "Very good, gentlemen, but not quite fast enough; no, decidedly not fast enough!" The voice was followed by a form which sidled up into the light of the desk candles, and there stood, bowing low, hat in one hand, a violin case in the other. Our visitor was literally as well as figuratively down at heel. His garments were threadbare and dusty; his hat had seen its best days long ago, and his long streaming hair lay about his head in wild confusion. The mute appeal of the violin case sufficed for sympathy with this strange and unlooked-for figure, but our visitor did not rely upon that. With another bow, and a wave of his dilapidated head gear, he broke into further speech: "Gentlemen, you will pardon me for intruding. Passing up the street I heard your music, and, as a musician myself, I was attracted. That is all. I am sure it is enough." "Of course," replied our leader, "and now that you are here, will you join us?" "Willingly; but, gentlemen, let me say that I am hungry, thirsty, and penniless. I had walked a long distance and am very weary." At this, every man in the band became a good Samaritan; the hat went round, and refreshment was promptly brought from a neighbouring inn. Meanwhile our guest informed us that he made his living, such as it was, by wandering from place to place, fiddle in hand, looking out for just such an opportunity as our meeting afforded, and supplying music, in a general way, wherever he found a desire for it. "Sometimes I am up," said the poor fellow, "but very often I am down," and then he addressed himself to the viands, of which, I distinctly remember, an exceedingly good and rapid account was given. Thus refreshed, our musical tramp took his instrument from its case and ran lightly over it with brilliant scales and arpeggios. We looked at each other with wide open eyes. "How is it," demanded Mr. Player, in a magisterial tone, "that a performer of your class is wandering about the country like a common vagabond?" The stroller made a deprecatory gesture: "I have been unfortunate, Sir. You will not ask further. It is my fate, and I do not complain." Of course there was nothing more to say on our side. "Come," cried the visitor, "let us go through 'Figaro' again, in the correct tempo, three minutes, you know, from start to finish." At this there was a laugh, but we followed our new leader with spirit if not exactitude, and reached home together, amid the compliments of the master, who presently said, "Now you shall hear what I can do." Then followed example after example of unaccompanied violin music all played, in our judgment, with as much distinction as accuracy. The man seemed to have the whole repertory of such pieces in his head, and as one followed another, while the artist, warming to his work, shook his long hair and swayed from side to side, we were held spell-bound. To me the performance was a revelation, and my memory has ever since preserved the player's face and figure. Long years after a visitor called at my house who almost tricked me into belief that the Thornbury tramp had re-appeared, in better clothes and with a more prosperous air. That visitor was the late Edward Remenyi.

The solos at last came to an end, but the soloist had yet something to do. Bowing once more, and making his curious deprecatory motion of the hand, he said: "If I have pleased you, gentlemen, and you think me worthy, give me a concert in this room." This took us rather aback, but, on second thoughts, seemed feasible enough, and, greatly to our guest's delight, his request was granted. Bills and programmes were hastily printed; the local musicians went from house to house selling tickets, and on the eventful evening the Town Hall contained a good audience. What the band did towards filling out the programme on that occasion is of no consequence; what the soloist did was long remembered. The poor fellow, inspired by the prospect of many shillings, was in fine form, and the kindly folk covered him with applause. When all was over, a few ardent spirits lingered to see the last of the wanderer, who declared his intention of walking to Bristol that night. Fiddle case in hand, and the proceeds of the concert in his pocket, the mysterious one set out on his journey over twelve miles of darkness. We attended him to the outskirts of the town and, after leave-taking, watched the solitary figure till the gloom swallowed it up. Who the musician was, whence he came, and whither he went beyond Bristol, we never learned, nor did we ever see him again. I have always thought of him as the principal actor in some life-tragedy played on the stage with the curtain down. Perhaps it was as well not to go behind.

Reverting to the cultivation of instrumental music at the time and in the district to which reference has been made, I attribute much of it to the fact that there were very few organs in churches and chapels, and that where they failed it became almost a matter of principle to provide orchestral instruments. In some cases within my knowledge such instruments were church property and passed from hand to hand as one player succeeded another. So, while answering their primary purpose as regards public worship, they served to keep the sacred lamp of the art alight, and did most admirable service. When, in later years, organs became common and harmoniums spread over the land, the cult of orchestral instruments decayed, and even where, as at Thornbury, it held a strong position, hardly a vestige remained. Societies were broken up, and the work of generations was undone. Happily, I have lived to see a revival, and to know that on high days in the ecclesiastical year, organ and orchestra join forces "to the praise and glory of God."

JOSEPH BENNETT.

AMATEUR CRITICS.

THE musical critic is a sort of Ishmaelite, against whom all hands are raised. And, unhappily for him, when he makes a mistake—for he cannot always wait till he knows before he prophesies—his written words remain in evidence against him. Quite recently, Mr. Crowest has written a book about Verdi, and filled the greater part of it with cuttings from The Times and the Athenæum, to show how hopelessly wrong Davison and Chorley were in their judgments of anyone who was not Mendelssohnian. In this particular instance, as it happens, the pains might have been spared, for it can scarcely be maintained that "Nabuco," or "Attila," or any other of the early Verdi operas, were not deserving of severe criticism, though it must be confessed that both these critics were more eager to discover faults than to discern promise. As it has been pointed out, Mr. Crowest's own critical powers may be looked upon with suspicion if he holds that even "Trovatore" still "makes a deep impression upon audiences."

Yes, it is easy enough to show up critics in the light of the clearer knowledge which time alone can give, and no doubt it affords every pettifogging composer some consolation to reflect that other great geniuses, from Beethoven to Wagner, have suffered in like manner from "those critics." But I wonder some of those critics do not carry the war into the enemies' camp, as they well might do. There is plenty of material, even though the "enemy" has not always written a book.

For professional musicians, when they pose as amateur critics, are not much better. Personally, I am convinced they are much worse, for all artists, using the word in its broadest sense, are almost necessarily self-centred, and find it difficult to judge impartially of methods other than their own. As Weber's son said, when extenuating his father's limited appreciation of Beethoven, "The more truly the tendency of any artist springs out of his own nature, the less he can admit the genuineness of any other's tendency; the less he can comprehend it. Genius cannot but be fanatical; its concessions can but be hypocrisy. Great artists, consequently, are the worst art-critics." One has only to recall the unguarded utterances of composers and painters, of vocalists and virtuosi, on each other, to realise this.

I once had occasion to make a collection of criticisms which time had falsified, and I was struck by the fact that the large majority were not by professional critics, but by composers and eminent executive artists. The most familiar instance is the praiser of the past, who, when his receptive faculties are deadened, is apt to see no good in what is new. Burney gives a good example of this in his "Present State of Music in France and Italy," when he records the pessimistic views of contemporary music entertained by one Rinaldo di Capua, "an old and excellent Neapolitan composer." Again, in Burney's memoirs, we have a glimpse of the old Doctor at a dinner party strenuously defending the composers of the day against the Handel-worshippers. His words will bear quotation, for, mutatis mutandis, they are as applicable to-day as they were in 1805:—

"Unacquainted . . . with the bigoted devotion to the exclusive merit of Handel that I had to encounter, I got into a hot dispute. . . . The expression 'modern refinements' happened to escape me, which both my lord and his lady, with a tone of consummate contempt, repeated: 'Modern refinements, indeed!' 'Well then,' cried I, 'let us call them modern changes of style and taste; for what one party calls refinements the other, of course, constantly calls corruption and deterioration.' They were quite irritated at this; and we all three then went to it ding-dong! I made use of the same arguments that I have so often used in my musical writings—that ingenious men cannot have been idle during a century; and the language of sound is never stationary, any more than that of conversation and books. . . . And to say that these symphonies of Haydn, and the compositions of Mozart and Beethoven, have no merit because they are not like Handel, Corelli, and Geminiani . . . is supposing time to stand still."

Here we find Handel taken as the standard, but Dr. Burney might well have used as an argument a conversation he had with the composer Hasse and his wife, many years before, showing that even Handel was not entirely appreciated by his contemporaries. While admitting his powers as a melodist, Hasse "thought him too ambitious of displaying his talent of working parts and subjects, as well as too fond of noise, and Faustina" (his wife, the Italian prima donna) "added, that his cantilena was often rude."

Dear old Papa Haydn, one would have thought, was orthodoxy itself; but we are told that Kotzeluch and Kreibig represented him to the Emperor Joseph II. as a mere mountebank, while he "was accused of trying to found a new school, though his compositions were at the same time condemned as for the most part hasty, trivial, and extravagant." Singers have always been ready to condemn music that was not exactly suited to their methods as "unvocal," and in Haydn's case Madame Mara is reported to have said, regarding the solos in the "Creation," "that she thought the voice an excellent accompaniment to the instruments." To think of "On mighty pens" spoken of in the same terms that one now hears employed concerning Isolde's "Liebestod"!

Mozart fared no better. His "Zauberflöte" was styled by the Italians "musica scelerata," without any melody; and the same Kotzeluch, the composer of operas, cantatas, and thirty symphonies, pronounced the "Don Giovanni" Overture "good, but full of faults"; and after hearing the full rehearsal of the "Zauberflöte" Prelude, is said to have exclaimed, "Ah, our good friend Mozart is trying to be learned this time!" Sarti, a composer of more than common repute in his time, was so incensed by the later quartets of Mozart that he took the trouble to write an "essame acustico fatto sopra due frammenti di Mozart." He expresses his disgust that "barbarians, without any sense of hearing, should presume to think that they can compose music," and after pointing out mistakes "which could only be made by a clavier player, who can see no difference between D sharp and E flat," ends by styling the compositions "de la musique pour faire boucher ses oreilles." The passage is given at length in Jahn's biography.

Beethoven, of course, being a great original genius, fared rather badly at the hands of contemporary composers. Dionys Weber, director of the Prague Conservatoire, was careful to guard his pupils from the deleterious influence of Beethoven's music, and Schindler tells us that it was not till the "Eroica" was forty years old that it was executed for the first time at Prague. Moscheles, when a lad, came under his tuition, and reports his master as giving vent to these sentiments: "Who on earth is there, excepting Mozart, Clementi, and Bach? A pack of crazy, hare-brained fools, who turn the heads of our young people. Beethoven, clever as he is, writes a lot of hare-brained stuff, and leads pupils astray." What an exact parallel to this is afforded by our own Royal Academy of Music under Macfarren's sway! How one can picture dear old Sir George declaiming against Wagner, and vowing that he should never lead the young Academicians astray with his unorthodox progressions and his immoral valve-horns! But far greater men than Dionys Weber mistrusted Beethoven. His illustrious namesake, Carl Maria von Weber, wrote an article in the Morgenblatt in December, 1809, satirising the Fourth Symphony, a summary of which is given by Sir George Grove in his recent work on the Symphonies. It ends with "the last Vienna receipt for a Symphony" as follows: "First a slow movement full of short, disjointed, unconnected ideas, at the rate of three or four notes per quarter of an hour; then a mysterious roll of the drum and passage of the violas, seasoned with the proper quantity of pauses and ritardandos; and, to end all, a furious Finale, in which the only requisite is that there should be no ideas for the hearer to make out, but plenty of transitions from one key to another—on to the new note at once! never mind modulating!—above all things, throw rules to the winds, for they only hamper a genius." And when the Seventh Symphony appeared, Weber is reported to have said, after hearing it, that Beethoven was now ripe for the madhouse. Nor was he the only one to affect doubts as to Beethoven's sanity, for we all know how the "posthumous" quartets for years were commonly known as the "mad" quartets. Spohr, who was, for a composer, an uncommonly fair and open-minded critic of other men's music, could not altogether accept the C minor Symphony, now the most universally popular of all the nine. His criticism is interesting. "Though with many individual beauties," he writes in his autobiography, "it does not constitute a classical whole. For instance, the introductory theme of the very first movement is wanting in that dignity which, according to my feeling, the commencement of a symphony should of necessity possess. Setting this aside, the sweet and easily comprehended theme certainly permits of being carried out very thematically, and is combined also by the composer with the other principal ideas of the first movement in an ingenious and effective manner. The slow movement in A flat is in part very fine, yet the same passages and modulations repeat themselves much too frequently, and although always with a richer ornamentation, become in the end wearisome. The Scherzo is highly original, and of real romantic colouring, but the Trio, with the noisy running bass, is to my taste much too rough. The concluding movement, with its unmeaning noise, is the least satisfactory, nevertheless the return to the Scherzo in this part is so happy an idea that the composer may be envied for it. Its effect is most captivating! But what a pity that this impression is so soon obliterated by the returning noise!" Though we may see with different eyes nowadays, this is at any rate a fair and legitimate criticism, and is rather refreshing to read now, when we are too much idolaters of Beethoven's genius to approach his works in a very critical or, in the strict sense of the word, appreciative spirit.

Generally speaking, Spohr was a staunch defender of Beethoven. When in Berlin, in 1804 or 1805, he played in one of the earlier quartets with Bernard Romberg, the famous violoncellist, who spoke very disparagingly of the music, saying, "My dear Spohr, how can you play such empty stuff (barockes Zeug) as that?" This is a characteristic attitude of the executive artist towards the creative genius, whose music does not always follow the idiom of the day, and is written more to express the composer's ideas than to show off the player's technique. Schindler tells us of Beethoven's Violin Concerto, that "the antagonists of the master found fault with the work as ungrateful; the violinists found it unplayable, being written in the high register of the instrument." Everyone knows the story of Handel's "Trionfo del Tempo," and how the famous violinist Corelli found the overture so difficult that, at his request, Handel wrote another more in the Italian style. Corelli was a modest, mild-mannered virtuoso, and remonstrated gently: "My dear Saxon, your music is in the French style, which I do not understand." How different a tone from that which one would hear the haughty members of, let us say, the London Philharmonic band adopt towards a young composer of twenty-three whose violin passages did not lie agreeably under their hands! Yes, I have heard violinists express their admiration for the march in the "Guillaume Tell" Overture simply on the ground of affording an opportunity for a delightful piece of fiddling, just as I have heard a vocalist defend Rossini's "Stabat Mater" on the simple plea that it was agreeable and effective to sing. Madame Mara's opinion of Haydn's vocal music I have already quoted, and another illustration of the vocalist's personal limitations is to be found in Madame Catalani, who, we are told, "detested Mozart's music, which keeps the singer too much under the control of the orchestra and too strictly confined to time, which she is apt to violate." Chorus-singers, too, one continually finds judging an oratorio or cantata, not on its intrinsic merits, but according to the effectiveness and vocal character of the chorus-writing. Like Mrs. Poyser's chanticleer, who imagined that the sun rose to hear him crow, your executive artist is very apt to think that the composer's primary function is to give him a chance of showing off.

I have still plenty of illustrations of amateur criticisms on Beethoven. Cherubini, according to Mendelssohn (letter from Paris, February 21, 1832), said of Beethoven's later music, "ça me fait éternuer," an expression which is not very easily understood nowadays, for we are inclined to look upon the so-called "Posthumous" quartets as by no means to be sneezed at. Berlioz was, to put it mildly, an historian of the imaginative order; but he is probably not romancing when he reports Lesueur as saying, after a performance of the C minor Symphony, "Il ne faut pas faire de la musique comme celle-la!" To which Berlioz, who, according to his own account, was always ready with a brilliant repartee, replied, "Soyez tranquille, cher maître, on n'en fera pas beaucoup."

I have referred to the views of bandsmen with regard to the technical side of the music they play. That there are limitations to their appreciation of its æsthetic side would appear from the reception the C minor Symphony of Beethoven and the great C major Symphony of Schubert met at the hands of the Philharmonic band. It is a story which has often been repeated how they jeered at the continuous triplets in the Finale of Schubert's work when Mendelssohn rehearsed it, and so irritated him that he withdrew not only it, but his own "Ruy Blas" Overture. They showed a penetration equal to that of their predecessors in 1814, when, as Sir George Grove tells, in his delightful book on the Beethoven Symphonies, they "received the opening [of the C minor] with much laughter, apparently thinking it was intended to be comic."

Weber, who, as we have seen, was so facetious concerning Beethoven's music, did not fare much better. Listen to this passage from Spohr's autobiography: "As up to that time I had no great idea of Weber's talent, I was naturally anxious to know 'Der Freischütz,' in order to account for the enthusiastic applause it had met with in the two capitals of Germany. Better acquaintance with the opera certainly did not afford me a solution of the riddle of its enormous success, and I could only account for it by Weber's peculiar gift and capacity for writing for the masses." This want of appreciation is the stranger, since it was Spohr himself who was among the first musicians of eminence to accept Wagner, whose dramatic writing owes not a little to Weber. It is much less surprising that second-rate composers like Weigl and Gyrowetz considered the writings of Weber—with whom they coupled Beethoven and Schubert—"entangled and chaotic."

The fun becomes "fast and furious" when we come to Wagner, whose aims were ill understood by his immediate contemporaries. Now, when his triumph is so complete—perhaps almost too complete for his level-headed admirers—we can afford to laugh at the hard things that were said of him. It took a large mind to appreciate the extent of his aims, to judge his music and his drama as an inseparable whole, and one can easily understand how a mere grammarian like Hauptmann found the "Tannhäuser" Overture "utterly hateful, inconceivably clumsy, long, and tiresome." "How," he continues, "could so clever a man have written it? The artistic vocation of anyone capable of writing and publishing an overture like this seems to me very doubtful."

It is easy to be wise after the event, but one can hardly refrain from the comment that the critical vocation of anyone capable of writing stuff like this seems still more doubtful. Fétis was another Dryasdust who fell foul of the same overture. As Mr. Hadow has pointed out, he errs even in a matter of fact when he says, "Beyond a poor, ill-harmonised chorale tune, the object of which is to recall the style of the thirteenth century, there is not a single spark of melody in the whole production."

This want of melody is the commonplace reproach applied to all music that can boast of some originality. Mr. Hullah perceived this when he wrote of Rameau: "As a matter of course—for no musical inventor has escaped this—his music was pronounced altogether deficient in melody, which is often tantamount to saying that it does not abound with familiar and common-place passages." It is unfortunate that, with such unexceptionable views as these, Mr. Hullah was not able to take the beam out of his own eye when, a few years later, he found "Lohengrin" "dull," and delivered himself of the following unhappy prediction: "That works after the manner of 'Lohengrin,' which—accepting the word 'music' in the sense for some centuries past given to it—may be described as operas without music, should take any permanent hold on the human soul, is to us simply inconceivable."

One does not expect one genius to have much tolerance for another. I have already quoted what Weber's son said to this effect, and I think a passage from one of the late Dr.

Hueffer's essays deserves quotation. He says, "A great original creator is necessarily a man of very individual stamp, and one who is engrossed by his idea, and therefore little in sympathy with other individualities of an entirely different stamp and equally engrossed. Such an attitude of mind does not lead to largeness of view and catholicity of taste; and these two qualities are of course most essential to the critic."

Thus it is easy to understand the want of sympathy that existed between Wagner and Brahms, or for Schumann's imperfect appreciation of Wagner. Schumann was, however, for a genius, singularly broad-minded, and two successive letters to Mendelssohn show this in a very striking light. In October, 1845, he writes: "There is Wagner, who has just finished another opera ['Tannhäuser'], undoubtedly a clever fellow, full of crazy ideas, and bold to a degree. The aristocracy is still raving about 'Rienzi,' but I declare he cannot write or imagine four consecutive bars that are melodious, or even correct. . . . The music is not a shade better than 'Rienzi'; in fact, rather weaker and more strained." In the following month, however, he has changed his mind, and is not ashamed to say so. "Perhaps we shall soon have a talk about 'Tannhäuser.' I must retract a good deal of what I wrote to you after reading the score. On the stage everything is very different. I was quite impressed by some of it." And two months later he writes to Dorn: "I wish you could see 'Tannhäuser,' by Wagner. It contains much that is deep and original, and a great deal of it is a hundred times better than his former operas, though some of the music is certainly very trivial. In short, he may become of immense importance to the stage, and, as far as I know him, he has got the courage for it. I consider the technical part, the instrumentation, excellent, and it is all far more masterly than it used to be." Here is a criticism which, as regards both praise and blame, can hardly be gainsaid nowadays. Still, Schumann was the exception that proved the rule. It would be absurd to contend that creative and executive musicians are unable to form a just appreciation of their contemporaries, and still more absurd to attribute their want of appreciation to jealousy. But their view of the artistic horizon is necessarily a limited one. They pick out what accords with their idiosyncrasies and judge that fairly enough; but they are too much engrossed with their own standpoint to care to take up that of anyone else. Their view may be a just one as far as it goes, but, from the nature of things, it must be more or less exclusive. And I certainly do not think that the thorny path of musical criticism would be made any smoother if the critics' places were usurped by the eminent composers and executants of the day.

FROM MY STUDY.

For desultory reading at this holiday time I have brought into the country all that was published of the Musical Examiner—a weekly journal which, born in November, 1842, had a brief but merry life of just over two years. The little sheet was financed and published by the firm of Wessel and Stapleton, then carrying on business in Frith Street, Soho Square, and edited, or, perhaps I should say, written and edited by James William Davison, who utilised its pages to make his first mark as a critic. At that time Davison was a composer and concert-giver, one of a band of young Englishmen—Sterndale Bennett, G. A. Macfarren, Loder, and others—who also composed and gave concerts, and were naturally jealous for the musical repute of their native land. In support of that repute generally, in aid of young musical England particularly, and in hope of doing some good to Wessel and Stapleton incidentally, the Musical Examiner was founded. For a fighting journal, no better editor could have been chosen than "J. W. D." He was just thirty years of age, impulsive in temperament, bold to the point of audacity, fluent of pen, and full of recondite lore with which he amused the knowing and confounded the witless. As a writer he, at that time, was intensely personal, no less as regards himself than with reference to others. He had innumerable love affairs—that is to say, a succession of idols commanded the homage of his heart, though they were not necessarily aware of it, and in looking through the periodicals edited by him nothing is easier than to trace the rise and fall of each charmer. In 1842 Davison worshipped Charlotte Dolby (afterwards Madame Sainton), and witness is borne to that fact by the Musical Examiner of August 19, 1843, which contains a rhapsodical leader beginning, "We are in the country," and going on to a heated invocation of a particular county: "Oh! fair and gentle B——shire [read Buckinghamshire], thou art our ladye-love among the counties of England. Were we poets, we could write sonnets to thee more glowing and full of worship than those with which Laura inspired Petrarca! Were we painters, we could pourtray thy various charms more cunningly than Rafaello described, unto an admiring world, the graces of his Fornarina. Were we musicians—or, rather, were we Handel, Mozart, Beethoven—we could, under the influence of thy presence, give birth to sounds more ravishing than all the freshest melody of Acis—all the passionate ecstasy of the G minor—all the gorgeous picturing of the Pastoral, in thy praise. Petrarca—Rafaello—Handel—Mozart—Beethoven never saw thee, Queen of Counties."

All this simply meant that Miss Dolby was spending her holiday in Buckinghamshire: "So beauteous art thou, B——shire, that a lady-bird doth dwell in thee, whose face is as the moon in the splendor of its full beaming—whose voice is as the song of the brook—whose form is as the willow in its grace," &c. Of course the fair charmer's name is not mentioned, but I happen to know that she was the then young and beautiful contralto, and thereby hangs a tale. Not only was Davison always passionately in love, but G. A. Macfarren also, and these close friends made confidants of each other on the question of their amours. They even assisted each other; in this way, for example: It sometimes happened that they worshipped at a distance, and were glad even to see the house which contained the sum of all feminine perfections. This enjoyment was enhanced to each by the sympathetic presence of the other. Davison would accompany Macfarren on occasions when the future knight desired to contemplate the gleam of the candle on the window-blind of his inamorata's apartment, and Macfarren would go with Davison into Buckinghamshire on the chance of approaching near to the mansion which held Miss Dolby as a guest. On one such trip to the "Queen of Counties" the young men made bold to scale the park wall, creep to a spot commanding the house, and there lie down; Macfarren, who was not immediately concerned, proceeding to make a sketch, while Davison alternated adoring glances in the direction of his "lady-bird" with study of the "Pastoral" Symphony. The Examiner leader does not tell all this, though it hints at some part thereof, nor do we learn from the printed page that the interlopers were surprised by a gamekeeper, who not only commanded them to go but saw that they went. I have in my possession a pianoforte piece composed by Davison shortly afterwards, in which the whole adventure receives musical expression; the passage describing the advent of the keeper being unmistakable even if the composer had not drawn attention to it in a marginal note.

I have been enticed into the details foregoing by a desire to show the intensity of Davison's nature. As he was in love, so was he in war. I can conceive no more vehement combatant. Not one among his favourite Knights of the Round Table rode more joyously into a fray than did the editor of the Musical Examiner, or acquitted himself more doughtily when action was joined. The established critics found him a galling thorn in the flesh. Nowadays, critics, save for here and there an Ishmael, do not assail each other; they keep aloof, or form small cliques, each having no connection with the establishment over the way. But we are divided by many more years than was Davison from the time when it was the fashion to scarify, to pass under the harrow, men who dared to think that they could write anything worth reading. The enemies, real or imagined, of English music had a bad time with the Examiner, especially the Athenæum, and more particularly that journal's musical critic, Henry Chorley. But the most merciless lashing was reserved for the late Charles Lewis Gruneison, who, being the critic of the Morning Post, was always styled Jenkins (name borrowed from Punch), till the editor, becoming bolder and more personal, preferred Greeneyeson. The quarrel arose, it seems, out of the fact that these mighty opposites took different sides on the occasion of an election to the Edinburgh Chair of Music; Davison favouring the cause of Sterndale Bennett, and Gruneison that of Dr. Gauntlett, neither of whom, by the way, carried off the prize. Whatever the first cause, no sooner did the Post use words derogatory to native art than Davison, writing in the Musical World as well as in the Musical Examiner, "went for" his offending colleague. "What are the opinions of such a writer worth?" he demanded in one paper, adding, in the other, "Jenkins . . . stands at the gates of Fame's temple to prevent the ingress of the artists of Great Britain, barking with trifold obstreperousness as they rashly present themselves before him." Again—the Post having girded at Moscheles—"The attack upon a great artist like Mr. Moscheles is another specimen of the 'blind-man's-buff' species of criticism which our friend Jenkins adopts. He must say something, and knowing nothing, he is naturally often at a loss to fix upon what that something is to be. This recalls to us a verse in an excellent song—

> Old King Cole on his cheek had a mole,
> So he called for his secretary,
> And he bade him to look in a fortune-telling book,
> And read him his destiny.
> So the secretary said, when his fate he had read,
> And cast his nativity,
> That a mole on the face boded something would take place,
> But not what that something might be.

And like the secretary poring over King Cole's nativity in a fortune-telling book, so is Jenkins listening to music in a concert-room—he knows he is listening to something, though not what that something may be." So on, and so on, till the stores of irony, sarcasm, and invective were exhausted; till, in the end, the two opponents made it up, and became better friends than ever. It is all poor thunder at this distance of time, the sort of thunder that comes through a phonograph; but it was real enough once, and serves, at any rate, as a warning now.

The Musical Examiner attacked the opera of the day not less boldly than it made onslaught on certain of the critics. We can only measure the audacity of the little paper by reading its remarks with full knowledge of the place which Italian opera held in the early forties. It was supreme, alike by public admiration of its works and by the enthusiasm with which its undoubtedly great artists were received. Davison tossed his gauntlet on the lyric stage. He said: "We should attend the opera regularly twice a week, and report thereon, were any works performed worth the trouble of sitting out. But it is not in us to keep awake during the 'chef d'œuvres' (!) of Bellini and Donizetti, however well interpreted by the artists employed. We cannot endure their eternity of quadrille tunes, still less their noisy, scratchy instrumentation, and least of all their abominable carelessness of all dramatic propriety. To listen to a gentleman or lady, supposed to be in the agonies of death, shouting with preposterous mock gravity a morbid waltz tune is too much for our nerves. . . . We have endeavoured strenuously to retain our gravity during the last scenes of 'Lucia' and 'Lucrezia,' but the absurd want of all character in the music moves us to risibility in spite of efforts to the contrary." This criticism of Italian opera sounds very modern, but there were, proverbially, kings before Agamemnon. Modern-seeming, too, is the writer's protest against cuts and other interference with the original. In this connection "J. W. D." did not shrink from assailing Costa himself: "Not in one, two, or three, but in twenty instances at least does Signor Michael Costa, 'pupil of the great Tritto,' entirely mistake the times of the pieces. Moreover, he, the conductor, has either added himself, or authorised another to add, or at least allows to be played as added, a villainous noise of trombones, &c., in the overture ["Don Giovanni"], which would have made the great Mozart, had he heard it, turn a somersault. What infamously bad taste is there in this interpolation of cacophonous blasts of brass instruments—as much out of place and out of character as a dromedary at a tea-party. . . . We have really no patience with this spirit of improving the masterpieces of men of genius, who, being dead, have nothing to say in defence of their original intentions. . . . We never will consent to such impious intermeddling. It will be said that we are hard upon Signor Costa, 'pupil of the great Tritto.' No such thing; Signor Costa is a pupil worthy of his wonderfully unknown master. But why does not Signor Costa, if the 'great Tritto' have infused any music into him, make better use of the authority consigned to him? Flattered by the turgid rhodomontade of Jenkins, doubtless Signor Costa thinks himself a person of immense consequence, and so he enters the orchestra, and says 'Hush!' and flourishes a gilt baton, with gyrations of infinite diversity and grace, and fancies that he has done all that is required of him, and, looking upon himself as something beyond a Napoleon, goes to bed on a champagne supper. But we can tell Signor Costa that, as conductor of Her Majesty's Italian orchestra, at Her Majesty's very Italian Opera, he has other and more important duties to perform than the mere flourishing of a stick about his ears." Now see how this terrible scribe handles the Italian artists. "The Italians avow that they cannot bear England or the English. . . . Poor things! They ought, indeed, to be well paid for the temporary endurance of such an atmosphere and such a population. It is dreadful to think of the sufferings they undergo. . . . Yes, reader, the Italian singers abuse and ridicule us—and take our money. Oh that we were but Italian singers!" The article from which the above extracts are taken called forth some protests, and the editor replied: "We are aware that in condemning the Italian singers we are arguing against the fashion of the day. But we are independent of its influence, and devote our poor talents to the good of art, and not to the interest of the animalcules floating in its atmosphere."

If I had only internal evidence to guide me, I should at once say that the editor of the Musical Examiner was a young man. But, like all others who begin with indiscriminate slashing, Davison sobered down as time went on and responsibility increased. Ultimately, it is curious to note, he became the champion of those he had earlier assailed, and swore by Rossini, Verdi, Costa, &c., as fervently as he had once sworn at them. Herein is a lesson for critical youth, which, however, none will heed. X.

Two volumes (LIV. and LV.) of the Dictionary of National Biography have been issued since we last noticed this invaluable work of reference. With the exception of Tallis, the names of musicians herein biographised are not of special importance. John Stanley, the blind organist, was a pluralist, as he held the appointment of St. Andrew's Church, Holborn, concurrently with that of the Temple Church. At the latter sanctuary, Handel was one of the forty or fifty organists who attended to hear their sightless brother play the outgoing voluntary. Although he was blind, Stanley was a good player at skittles, shovel-board, and billiards, and also of whist, using perforated cards. The "father of the oratorio" in Wales was the Rev. Edward Stephen, known as "Tanymarian," formerly pastor of a church at the euphonious-sounding place of Dwygyfylchi. His masterpiece was "The storm of Tiberias," an oratorio published in seven parts. Kitty Stephens was said to have had the sweetest soprano voice of her time—"full, rich, round, and lovely"—a natural manner, a simple style, disfigured by no affectation, which is a great deal more than can be said of some of the simpering warblers of the present day. When she was forty-three, Kitty married the Earl of Essex, an octogenarian widower. However, she only enjoyed one year of connubial bliss, and then, as Dowager Countess of Essex, entered upon her long widowhood of forty-three years. The genial Charles Edward Stephens was her nephew. The composer of "Ye spotted snakes" and "The cloud-capt towers," Richard John Samuel Stevens, naturally finds a place in this walhalla of distinguished folk. Stevens will best be remembered by his glees, but he was a Gresham Professor of Music, and succeeded John Stanley as organist of the Temple Church.

Two Irish musicians are here found in the persons of Sir John Stevenson (of whom Mr. J. S. Bumpus has written a very exhaustive monograph which is not mentioned in the article) and Sir Robert Stewart. The latter, as Professor of Music at the University of Dublin, was the first to make a literary test compulsory for candidates seeking musical degrees. There is an appreciative notice of Alfred Stone, of Bristol, who did excellent work there. In 1873 he organised the first Bristol Musical Festival. His early death, at the age of thirty-eight, was deeply lamented; and, as a proof of how greatly he was appreciated, a memorial fund of £2,000 was raised on behalf of his widow and family. We must pass over the two Storaces (Anna and Stephen)—the latter of whom wrote the ditty "No Song, no Supper"—and only refer to the rather dry notice of Tallis, which lacks the personal element so essential to an adequate biography, though in justice to the writer it must be said that the known details of Tallis's life are very meagre. There is William Tans'ur, an old psalmodist, who called himself "musico theorico," and subsequently "psalmodist, philo music and theology, and professor, corrector, and teacher of musick over fifty years"; also John Tavener and Edward Taylor. The latter was a Gresham Professor of Music, and as devoted a Spohrian as J. W. Davison was a Mendelssohnian. We miss the name of Elizabeth Stirling, probably the greatest English lady-organist, who did so much to make known the works of Bach in this country, even in her girlhood. Perhaps she may find a place in one of the Appendix volumes under her married name of Bridge. Without being a fanatical "Old Mortality," or, like old Sam Wesley, a devoted admirer of "Down among the dead men," we wish that the editor would insist upon his contributors supplying the place of burial in every case, unless it is absolutely impossible to discover where the interment took place. Although this monumental undertaking (i.e., the Dictionary) is approaching the end of the alphabet, two supplementary volumes are already announced which will contain at least thirteen additional names of musicians.

THE announcement that the Monday Popular Concerts have practically ceased to exist causes more regret than surprise. It is, however, satisfactory to learn that seven of these are to be given week by week from February 13 to March 27, 1899, at all of which Dr. Joachim will appear. Moreover, the Saturday Popular Concerts, which, according to official information, are still well supported by amateurs, will be given as usual, beginning on October 29. Had the Monday Pops., as they are familiarly called, continued until February the 14th next, they would have completed an existence of forty years. We take this opportunity of giving some information in regard to their early history. As a matter of fact, they owe their origin to the Cattle Show! The connection between bullocks and Beethoven, fat pigs and string quartets, is not at first sight very obvious, but the connection can be traced as follows: St. James's Hall had been opened on March 25, 1858, and the proprietors, Messrs. Chappell and Co., were naturally anxious to make the best use of their fine new building. Therefore they announced "Three Popular Concerts" to be given on three consecutive evenings, December 7, 8, and 9, 1858, during the week of the Cattle Show, which, at that time, was held at the Baker Street Bazaar, the Agricultural Hall not then being in existence. These three concerts, in which Arabella Goddard, Alfredo Piatti, and Sims Reeves took part, were popular in the literal sense of the term—in fact, they were rather too popular for the leading critic, Mr. J. W. Davison, who subsequently became one of the pillars, if not, indeed, the godfather of the institution as we now know it. This is how Mr. Davison bucolicly expressed his feelings, or, in more cattle-show parlance, penned his critical opinion:—

ST. JAMES'S HALL.

These concerts, denominated "Popular," were given at the above hall on the evenings of Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday, ostensibly got up for the London public, but directly addressed to the visitors who flock to town at this period of the year, eager to behold certain unctuous beasts rolling their larded sides in stifling pens at the Bazaar, Baker Street. It is not always, however, that the lovers of fatted beeves and eyeless pigs are attracted by a musical programme, or moved by the concord of sweet sounds. Dearer to the ears of our cattle-surfeiting gentry are the low of herds, the bull's loud bellow, the neigh of the gelding, the grunt of the pig, the quack of the duck, the cackle of the goose, the bray of the donkey—the whole artillery of the farm-yard—than the finest symphony or the sweetest song. The crowds expected from Baker Street did not arrive, and so the great hall of St. James's was not as well filled as might have been anticipated. Certainly one great attraction was wanting the first night, in Mr. Sims Reeves, whose Newcastle influenza, still lingering about him, prevented him from attending. On Wednesday and Thursday, however, he was able to attend, when the hall was better filled.

The three concerts were of the slightest possible contexture—such, indeed, as would have consorted better with entertainments given in remote suburban nooks, than in the splendid metropolitan hall. The programme exhibited a few eminent and several goodly names.

THE success attending these three "Cattle Show" concerts encouraged the promoters to give four more of a similar nature, in the announcement of which occurs the first use of the familiar designation Monday Popular Concerts. Here is the first sentence of the advertisement from the Musical World of December 25, 1858:—

ST. JAMES'S HALL.—MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.—In consequence of the great success of the late concerts, under the direction of Mr. Benedict, the entrepreneurs beg to announce that four more Popular Concerts will be given, in this magnificent hall, on the evenings of Mondays, January 3, 10, 17, and 24.

These four Monday Popular Concerts were also of a very miscellaneous nature. According to Mr. Davison, it seems that at the first concert the Swedish Minstrels "abandoned their picturesque, but somewhat too demonstrative costume, as they appeared for the first time in ordinary plain attire"; and that "there was a 'row' at the end of the second part, when Mr. Wilbye Cooper appeared to sing a song set down for Mr. Sims Reeves." But ultimately "Miss Arabella Goddard, with Signor Piatti, ascended the platform, and, despite the yells and shrieks which had driven Mr. Wilbye Cooper and the Swedish Minstrels from the orchestra, threw herself gallantly into the breach, and, in an instant, as if by touch of Armida's fairy wand, converted the cries of disapprobation into cheers of unbounded enthusiasm." As there appears to have been no further interruption during the evening, the duet "All's well" formed a fitting conclusion to the concert.

THEN came the great change in the character of the music performed at the Monday Popular Concerts. At one of those above referred to, Mr. J. W. Davison said to Mr. Arthur Chappell in St. James's Hall, "Why don't you make these concerts classical, and perform chamber music only?" The great critic of The Times duly unfolded his plan, with the result that a new series of concerts was duly announced. Though the music to be performed was decidedly *un*popular in character, no change was made in the name. The first of the regenerated "Monday Pops" took place at St. James's Hall on February 14, 1859, when the whole of the music performed was by Mendelssohn. The analytical programmes, at first without music-type illustrations, were written by Mr. Davison. The opening paragraph of his prefatorial note may be quoted:—

MONDAY POPULAR CONCERTS.

CLASSICAL SERIES.

In commencing a new series of entertainments (sic), the design of which may be understood by reference to the programme of this evening, the Directors of the Monday Popular Concerts wish to endow their undertaking with a more universal character than it has hitherto assumed. The advantages offered by St. James's Hall, and the resources placed at their disposal by the generous patronage they have experienced, will, it is confidently hoped, enable them to carry out their plans with success. So rapidly is the taste for pure and healthy music spreading through all classes of the community, that no enterprise of this kind can hope to prosper for any length of time, much less to attain a solid permanency, without taking this great social fact into consideration.

FIVE of the performers who took part in the opening concert (on February 14, 1859) of the classical series are still living. They are Herr Louis Ries (who only resigned his long-held post of second violin last season), Mr. C. W. Doyle, Signor Piatti, Dr. Edward J. Hopkins, and Mr. Santley, who sang "I'm a roamer." The two organ solos, played by Dr. Hopkins on Gray and Davison's one-manual instrument then in St. James's Hall, were the Prelude and Fugue in C minor (wrongly given in the programme as Op. 65, the opus number of the Sonatas) and the Fugue in B flat, from the "Magnificat of the evening service of the Protestant Church (Op. 69)." The various pieces were evidently chosen for the different performers, as Dr. Hopkins was asked to perform the Fourth Organ Sonata, which, of course, was impossible on a one-manual instrument; therefore, he was requested to play the Fugue from the Magnificat, probably because it was in the same key (B flat)! The one-composer programme, or half-programme, was continued nearly throughout the season, Mendelssohn being followed by Mozart, Haydn and Weber, Beethoven, Mozart again (at a concert given on Ash Wednesday), Beethoven twice again (both "by general desire"), and Bach and Handel, at which Mr. W. T. Best played four organ solos. After another Mendelssohn evening there followed a programme entirely devoted to native composers, who were represented instrumentally by G. A. Macfarren, G. F. Pinto, E. J. Loder, and Sterndale Bennett, the last-named by his charming Chamber Trio in A. Altogether fourteen concerts were given between February 14 and June 27, when the season closed. Thus we have attempted to trace the origin of the Monday Pops. The Saturday Popular Concerts were started on March 6, 1865. It is a matter of sincere congratulation that they are to be continued as heretofore. But we venture to express the hope that modern works will, from time to time, find a place in the repertory of these old established concerts, which recall many delightful memories.

THE fourth season of Mr. Robert Newman's Promenade Concerts was to commence at the Queen's Hall on the 27th ult. In a circular announcing the concerts, Mr. Newman, in regard to the orchestra, says: "I am pleased to say that will be also still further improved, as I have had some very first-rate new blood to select from. Every member is now capable of performing as a soloist, and I intend giving them all an opportunity of exhibiting their skill." We sincerely hope that Mr. Newman will give due notice of a solo on the bass drum, even if the performer should be one of the old members of the band and not one of the "very first-rate new blood." But to be quite serious, we wish Mr. Newman all the success he deserves in providing good music by an efficient orchestra under so skilled a conductor as Mr. Henry J. Wood.

MR. JOHN B. LOTT, organist of Lichfield Cathedral, has kindly sent us the following hitherto unpublished letter of Mendelssohn's, the original of which has recently come into his possession. It is addressed to John Thomson, of Edinburgh, then a young man of twenty-three, who was about to visit Berlin. The letter was written on the day that Mendelssohn visited Holyrood "in the evening twilight," when, as he said, "I believe I found to-day in that old chapel the beginning of my Scotch Symphony." Moreover, it has special interest in that it must have been one of Mendelssohn's earliest attempts in epistolary English, his first visit to Great Britain (our Scotch readers will appreciate this designation) having been paid in the year 1829. We print the letter exactly as it stands in the original:—

Edinburgh,
30 July, 1829.

MY DEAR SIR,

Accept my best & sincere thanks for the delightful song of yours, you were so kind as to send me to-day. Every time when I shall play it, it will give my the greatest treat, both, for its musical value, and for renovating the recollections of the most happy hours, I passed with you & your friends in this town. I enclose some letters for Berlin; one to the director of the Academy, Prof. Zelter, another to my friend the great violin player, Mr. Ritz, and a third to my mother. Mr. Klingemann, who begs to present you his best compliments, has written the lines for Mdlle. Solmar, a most amiable & clever lady, whose acquaintance will give you at all events great pleasure. I regret sincerely, that the short time of my stay in Edinburgh, did not allow me, to give you more lettres for other friends of mine; but as I asked my family to introduce you to every body whose acquaintance may be interesting & usefull to you, I hope notwithstanding you will be able to know a great part of our musical people at Berlin. I think you would better go first to my family, whose residence is "Leipziger Strasse No. 3," because they will give you the addresses for your other lettres, and I hope you may be as well pleased, with my native town, as I am it with yours.

Believe me,
My Dear Sir,
Yours very truly,
F. MENDELSSOHN BARTHOLDY.

John Thomson was the first Reid Professor of Music in the University of Edinburgh, which post he held for less than two years, from October, 1839, till his lamented death, on May 6, 1841, at the age of thirty-six. In a letter, dated the same day as the above, to his family at Berlin—which, by the way, was not his "native town"—Mendelssohn refers to Thomson in these terms: "He is very fond of music; I know a pretty trio of his and some local pieces, which please me very well (ganz gut gefallen)." Professor Thomson's chief claim to distinction rests upon his having written the first analytical programme, at least in these Isles. The story has been fully told by Mr. J. S. Shedlock in THE MUSICAL TIMES of September and November, 1897, pp. 593 and 760.

AN unusually choice specimen of the Queen's English as it is "made in Germany" has been kindly forwarded to us by a correspondent. It loses none of its charm through being in the form of an advertisement. Here it is in all its unadorned whimsicalities:—

Now ready: in the three languages, english, french, and german. Julius Erich Kloss Twenty years of "Bayreuth."

We seen a history of the tragedy in Bayreuth, in which the author in magnificent composition show us the different works of RICHARD WAGNER in the finest countenance.

On this historical part comunicated a second port polemical, in which the talented author to ward off all the attacks towards Rich. Wagner and his greatest work Bayreuth.

This book is not a common guide, but a work very warm written, it is to be prominent wide over the value of a work of occasion.

To have through all booksellers of the world. Sample copies will be send on receigt of remittance post-free.

A book that "is to be prominent wide over the value of a work of occasion" would seem to be a desirable addition to the treasures of one's library. There is, however, a certain tendency to ambiguity in "the different works of Richard Wagner in the finest countenance," but a different complexion might be placed thereupon by a perusal of this volume, "very warm written."

MORE than one story could be told of the music at weddings. On the occasion of the nuptials of an octogenarian bridegroom, after the organist had played over Gauntlett's familiar tune, which is also associated with another hymn, some of the naughty choristers started off singing "Brief life is here our portion." At another similar ceremony the bride was so late in arriving that one of the company declared that he could detect the strains of "Oh dear, what can the matter be?" ingeniously worked with those of "Alice, where art thou?" (Alice being the name of the fair bride) by the presiding organist. But the correspondent above referred to draws attention to a newspaper report of a recent marriage which spoke of "Lohengrin's and Mendelssohn's Wedding-Marches." Another description of a wedding supplies the grave information that "during the signing of the registers, the organist played the Burial Chorus from Lohengrin." Was this a rehearsed incident?

AN instance of the difficulties which beset the path of the historian in matters biographical is furnished in the following incident. The writer of the article for the "Dictionary of National Biography" on the ill-fated Joseph Augustine Wade was anxious to obtain authentic information of his death. The various dictionaries give the date of his demise as July 15, 1845, and the place where he drew his last breath as the Strand, which proved to be quite correct. But, strangely enough, Wade's name is not to be found in the Indexes of Deaths at Somerset House. It should be added that a death very seldom escapes being registered, because of the difficulties that would arise in any attempt to bury the body without the certificate. "Try the Unknowns," suggested a courteous official at Somerset House; but no male "unknown" is indexed as having died in the Strand in the third quarter of 1845. (In looking down this long list of "unknowns," the thought arises—what terrible life-tragedies some of these entries must represent.) The case seemed to be getting hopeless. But further search at Somerset House, in the various registers themselves of those districts which include the thoroughfare of the Strand, ultimately revealed the fact that the death is registered, but as Joseph Augustine Ward, instead of Wade! The information of Wade's death was supplied to the registrar by a woman living in one of the squalid courts near the Strand, who could not write her name! She was probably a genuine Sairey Gamp of a very *gin*teel type, with the result that her articulation was on an equality with her illiteracy, hence the mistake—Ward for Wade. Thus died poor Wade—friendless and penniless. The actual cause of his death is registered as "inflammation of the brain," but the predisposing cause, alas! is not far to seek. His age is stated in the register as "44," which, if the statement can be relied upon, would make him to have been born in 1801—a little later date than is generally approximated. The place of Wade's burial is at present unknown. Can any of our readers supply the information? Has Mr. Algernon Ashton an entry of the name in his Burial Ledger, or Tombstone Journal?

M. PADEREWSKI contributes the following interesting remarks to the September number of Sandow's magazine, Physical Culture, on the subject of the association of pianoforte playing with muscular strength. The great pianist says:—

It is highly desirable that he who strives to attain the highest excellence as a performer on the pianoforte should have well-developed muscles, a sound nervous system, and, in fact, be in as good general health as possible. It might be thought that practice on the pianoforte in itself would bring about the necessary increase in muscular power and endurance. This, however, is not altogether the case, as, though undoubtedly playing does in some cases develop muscles by constant use, in other cases it has a distinctly deteriorative effect owing to the muscles being kept cramped and unused. The chief muscles actually used are those of the hand, the forearm, neck, small of the back, and the shoulders. The latter only come into play in striking heavy chords for which the hands and arms are considerably raised from the keys; in light playing the work is chiefly done from the wrists, and, of course, the forearm muscles which raise and lower the fingers.

It is not so much that greater strength of muscle will give greater power for the pianoforte, but rather that the fact of the muscles being in good condition will help the player to express his artistic talent without so much effort. To play for a great length of time is often very painful and distressing. The strain on the neck and shoulders—on the trapezius and deltoid muscles which govern the movements of the shoulders and arms—becomes at times almost unbearable, and you cannot expect a player to lose himself in his art, and to throw all his powers and feelings into his work, when every movement of his hands is provocative of discomfort, if not actual pain. Sometimes, indeed, a great amount of playing brings on a special form of complaint known as "pianist's cramp," which may so affect the muscles and nerves that the unfortunate artist, thus afflicted, finds his occupation gone.

I have frequently found that though, whilst playing, I have experienced no trouble from my muscles being overtaxed, afterwards the re-action has set in, and I have had no little exhaustion and weakness in the muscles of the shoulders and neck, and I have also suffered from severe neuralgic pains affecting the nerve which runs from the head and conveys impulses from the brain to the deltoid muscle. Weakness in the small of the back has also been by no means uncommon.

THE General Assembly of the Irish Presbyterian Church has recently given what is practically a final deliverance on the vexed question of organs. While "overtures" have long received full ecclesiastical recognition by the Irish Presbyterians in General Assembly assembled, the "kist o' whustles," to use the phraseology of the "land o' thistles," has hitherto been under anathema. Henceforth, however, any congregation may go on its way rejoicing, without fear and trembling, organwards. As there are about 600 Presbyterian churches in Ireland at present organless, the future prospects of the organ builder in the Emerald Isle must be considered hopeful. But as this organ movement is yet "in the green," so to speak, it may be some time before organists find an El Dorado in Presbyterian Paddy-land.

The qualification of "phenomenal," as applied to the German waiter, might appear, at first sight, to be somewhat paradoxical. It would seem to be justified, however, in the case of a particular member of that ubiquitous and highly respectable fraternity, whose exquisite tenor voice—we are informed in the columns of the Flensburger Nachrichten—lately attracted the attention and aroused the enthusiasm of Herr Erik Schmedes, of the Vienna Opera, during his brief sojourn at Fanöe, on the coast of Denmark. His admiration was communicated to other well-to-do visitors of the place, with the result that an ample subscription was at once forthcoming to provide for the adequate training of the possessor of so rare a gift.

The "House of Repose for Musicians" at Milan, founded by Signor Verdi, is now almost finished. Situated in the Piazza Michelangelo Buonarrotti, outside the Porta Magenta, it is destined to house one hundred musicians—sixty men and forty women—during the remaining years of their lives. There is a central hall for meetings and concerts, two open terraces, an oratory, and an infirmary. Verdi desired that the house should not bear his name, but the Milan people already call it the "Casa Verdi." A recent issue of the Gazetta Musicale (published by Messrs. Ricordi) contains some interesting views of the exterior of the new Home. The architect of this magnificent building, due to the munificent liberality of the veteran composer, is Signor Camillo Boïto, brother of the composer of "Mefistofele."

Dr. Hans Richter has had the very rare distinction of the Freedom of the City of Vienna conferred upon him, honoris causâ, and the great conductor was "sworn in" as one of Vienna's most worthy "Bürger" on the 4th ult. Dr. Richter, it is scarcely necessary to add, is a native of Hungary. Musicians appear to be in special request just now with Austrian municipalities, to judge from the further and equally unusual occurrence of a member of the profession, Herr Rudolph Zöllner, having been recently elected mayor of the important and fashionable health resort of Baden, near Vienna. Herr Zöllner was for many years a member of the Imperial Opera orchestra, and is an excellent all-round musician, who ought to be particularly qualified to infuse "harmony" into the municipal councils.

Mr. J. S. Shedlock has been appointed musical critic of the Athenæum in succession to Mr. H. F. Frost, who, we much regret to learn, has resigned on account of ill-health. Mr. Shedlock brings to his new duties ripe scholarship, wide experience, and a keen critical faculty. We congratulate him.

We hope to give a biographical sketch and special portrait of Mr. Edward Dannreuther in our October number. The incidents of Mr. Dannreuther's distinguished career are sure to be of a very interesting and varied nature.

FACTS, RUMOURS, AND REMARKS.

Alfredo Piatti is so modest of nature, such a hater of fuss and pother about himself, that the friends who resolved to mark their appreciation of his great worth as a man and artist had to do so with precaution. They managed the matter very well. The great cellist had, probably, not the smallest inkling of what was going on, and the receipt of a silver casket, a masterpiece of Georgian work, containing a beautifully illuminated address, was a surprise. Had he been consulted about the presentation, Mr. Piatti would, no doubt, have discouraged it. But as he was not, the gift must have pleased him by its testimony that his English admirers were neither unappreciative nor forgetful. Of this the terms of the address gave emphatic assurance. Inasmuch as the testimonial was not thrown open for public signature, no more than a few score names were appended. But these were of the best, comprising the élite of our amateurs and professionals, the Princess of Wales at their head. May Alfredo Piatti live long to treasure the English gift and to see in it a grateful reminder of half-a-century's work in the island of the North.

The Berlin correspondent of the Revue Internationale de Musique notices the design of his neighbours to raise a monument to Richard Wagner. Remarking that the German capital is crowded with the statues of generals, most of whom owed their notoriety to defeats inflicted upon them by Napoleon, Mr. Marcel Rémy, the correspondent in question, quotes a sentence from the manifesto of the committee: "Germany has not only conquered on the bloody field of the art of war, but also in the garden, sown with flowers and bordered with laurels, of the Muses"; and goes on to ask: "Will they engrave on the pedestal the 'Ode to the German army before Paris,' or 'A Capitulation'? That would only be logical."

Mr. Rémy contends that Berlin is not, in reality, a Wagnerian town. "Evidently, as a capital with two millions of inhabitants, it contains partisans of all shades, and consequently a strong representation of the friends and enlightened admirers of the great master. As to a sympathetic general movement, no. The Academy is almost hostile to Wagner—in any case, refractory; the middle classes, who love all music, enjoy the popular Wagner evenings of the Philharmonic; but the bourgeoisie and society prefer classical music—Beethoven, and his pseudo-heir, Brahms. The Opera makes, with the early scores of the master, receipts equal to those of the old repertory. But this proves nothing, or only shows that the old music is as popular as the new. The rare performances of the "Ring," which take place only in the season when a public of foreigners is available, should form the basis of a Wagnerian repertory if a Wagnerian movement existed. Wagner is played because the other German towns play him and there is always the pressure of the foreigners. But for this, his name would disappear from the bills. A disinterested taste for his music does not exist. These observations will make more comprehensible the non-success of the Musical Exhibition, the proceeds of which were destined for the Wagner monument." They may also help us to understand why the Germans keep aloof from Bayreuth, leaving it to be supported by the foreigner.

I have received a second letter from Mr. T. King Holtham on the correct phrasing of classical music; this being in reply to some remarks by Mr. Herbert Rowledge. After declaring himself a warm admirer of Mendelssohn, and a non-believer in his infallibility, Mr. Holtham goes on to say:

It may be news to Mr. Rowledge, but I have it as an undoubted fact, that Mendelssohn treated the third movement of the Second Sonata, the Allegro Maestoso, in tempo rubato throughout (the ascending scale passage in the right hand being treated to a very decided rallentando, with a pause on the top B flat each time the passage occurs, and a similar rallentando on the descending scale passage in the pedal part the twice it appears), though there is no indication of such treatment in the text. Where Mendelssohn required strictly legato playing without any phrasing whatever, he either omits the slurs altogether, places a slur over the whole passage, or uses the term "sempre legato."

CONTINUING, my correspondent says:—

But the whole question resolves itself into this: None have known better than the Great Masters the value of the art of phrasing, but were they as particular as they might have been in correctly indicating such phrasing in their works? I say no; and to back up my contention I should like to ask Mr. Rowledge to play the third movement and the opening of the fourth movement in the Fourth Sonata, phrased exactly as the slurs appear in the best known editions, and then say if this phrasing satisfies his requirements as a musician. If the slurs mean anything and are supposed to indicate the phrasing, then these two beautiful movements are, in my opinion, absolutely ruined and made grotesque by what I don't hesitate to call the false phrasing indicated.

OF course, the matter here discussed opens up the whole question of interpreting, whether as editor or performer, the works of great masters, and invites us to plough the sands of barren controversy. I myself have always fought for the integrity of composers' works, but never for the infallibility of copies, into which errors drift as naturally as into any other written or printed matter. Nor have I ever lost sight of the fact that the old composers were often careless, and showed quite touching confidence in the discretion of their interpreters when that course saved them trouble. It is in such cases that an editor or performer has the privilege of exercising his own judgment—a privilege absolutely unassailable. But much depends upon the way in which judgment is exercised. I hold that the reviser in such a case should do his work in a thoroughly conservative spirit, assuming the correctness of the text till investigation declares it to be erroneous, and requiring in every case evidence clear enough for the satisfaction of a reasonable and impartial mind. Unfortunately, too many editors import their own feeling and fancies into their work, and determine what seems to them right, rather than the intentions of the composer. Such persons are unfit for editorial work, and have been the cause of much trouble.

WONDERFUL to tell, the National Eisteddfod at Blaenau Festiniog resulted in a surplus of several hundred pounds, instead of the usual deficit. At Newport last year there was a heavy loss, and at Llandudno in 1896 much had to be made up by guarantors. Hence the surprise felt when Blaenau invited the Eisteddfod into the heart of the mountains was reasonable. How could such an out-of-the-way place succeed where Newport and Llandudno had failed? But the thing was done, and the secret of its doing lies in the thoroughly business qualities of the managers, who had not only the spirit of liberality, but also of prudence. I cannot remember an enterprise of the kind better managed, alike in big things and small. The success was well won, and prospective committees, in view of a like task, might do worse than go to Blaenau for a lesson.

LOOKING back upon the five days' doings at Blaenau, I find my attention aroused by these things: first, the excellent voices and generally good singing of the solo vocal competitors; second, the curiously unequal work done by the choirs which entered for the great prizes, and the supreme merit of the winners; third, the ludicrous failure of the competitors who essayed a sight singing test of moderate difficulty; fourth, the grievous lack of contestants in the instrumental department, apart from the fair number which competed on the violin. Regarding the first point, I have only to say that alike as to voices and certain executive qualities, the Blaenau district seems as rich as it undoubtedly is in slates. One might find there the material for any number of good singers. On the second point, it is to be remarked that while the winning choir in the principal choral contest sang faultlessly, the performance in other cases showed grave defects, even in such an elementary matter as singing in tune. Nevertheless, false intonation is much less common in Wales than formerly. Conductors have learnt the lesson of restraint. The third point calls for question whether the conditions of Welsh popular training in music are sufficiently favourable to sight singing. The first care is to get a piece off by heart, and to practise incessantly with every eye fixed on the conductor. That may do for competitive purposes, but it is not the way to make good all-round singers. The failures in sight singing at Blaenau were simply laughable, although the contestants sang from tonic sol-fa copies. On the last point, I can do no more than regret that the progress of instrumental music in Wales is so slow; but it does progress, and that is something.

JOSEPH BENNETT.

A NEW FESTIVAL CONDUCTOR.

MR. A. HERBERT BREWER.

THE Cathedral organist has often been portrayed as a tradition-loving, groove-addicted, benevolent-looking old gentleman, who, day by day, pursues the even tenor of his ways with strict punctiliousness. But it is a remarkable fact that at the present time there are no less than twelve Cathedral organists who, we believe, are under thirty-five years of age—energetic young men who are full of enthusiastic zeal and hold progressive opinions on matters musical. One of their number is Mr. A. Herbert Brewer, the organist of Gloucester Cathedral, who, by virtue of his office, will, for the first time, be conductor of the Three Choirs Festival about to be held in the city on the banks of the Severn.

Alfred Herbert Brewer was born at Gloucester, June 21, 1865. As his boyhood was passed there he must have been familiar with the form of his most distinguished predecessor in the organistship, Dr. Samuel Sebastian Wesley. Before he was eleven years old Master Brewer became a chorister in the Cathedral of his native city, where he received his earliest instruction in music from Dr. S. S. Wesley's immediate successor, Dr. C. Harford Lloyd. One of his fellow pupils under Dr. Lloyd, at Gloucester, was George Robertson Sinclair, now organist of Hereford Cathedral and also a Festival conductor. After a choristership of four years' duration, Mr. Brewer was appointed organist of St. Catherine's Church, Gloucester, in April, 1881, which post he exchanged, in the following November, for that of St. Mary de Crypt in the same city. For two years he was also assistant-organist at the Cathedral. When, in September, 1882, Dr. Lloyd left Gloucester and went to Oxford, his pupil accompanied him to the University city. He acted as assistant-organist at Christ Church Cathedral, and succeeded Sir Walter Parratt as organist of St. Giles's Church, Oxford.

Mr. Brewer gained the first open scholarship at the Royal College of Music in April, 1883, and was thus one of its first pupils. At the College he studied under Sir Walter Parratt, Sir Frederick Bridge, and Professor Stanford. He was elected organ scholar of Exeter College, Oxford, in the following December, and for some time he was president of the Oxford University Musical Club. Mr. Brewer's next appointment was to St. Michael's Church, Coventry, where he greatly improved the musical features of the services.

FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY G. COLES, GLOUCESTER.

He also threw much energy into his work as conductor of the Coventry Musical Society, which he infused with new life. After six years' excellent work in Coventry, Mr. Brewer left the famous bicycle producing town in September, 1892, upon being appointed organist and choirmaster of Tonbridge School. Here, as at Coventry, he laboured with gratifying results, not only in regard to his teaching duties in the School, but as conductor of the Tonbridge Choral Society and also the School Choral and Orchestral Society.

His native city, however, had not lost sight of Herbert Brewer during his fourteen years' absence. In December, 1896, he was appointed organist of Gloucester Cathedral, where he had formerly been a chorister. This important appointment carries with it the conductorship of the Three Choirs Festivals once in three years. Mr. Brewer is also conductor of the Gloucester Choral Society, which numbers nearly 200 singing members, and of the Gloucester and Bristol Diocesan Choral Union. He took his degree of Bachelor in Music at the University of Dublin in December last and became a Fellow of the Royal College of Organists in January, 1897.

Mr. Brewer has been a busy composer. His various published works include an operetta, "Rosamund," produced at Coventry, in September, 1897. An Evening Service in C for soprano solo, chorus, and orchestra, composed expressly for the Gloucester Festival of 1895; also three other Evening Services in A, F, and B flat, Te Deum and Jubilate in B flat, six part-songs, organ music, &c., all of which show a commendable earnestness of purpose and conscientious workmanship. For this year's Festival he has composed, by request, a setting of Psalm xcviii. for soprano and bass solos, chorus, and orchestra.

The many friends of Mr. Brewer in Oxford, Coventry, Tonbridge, and elsewhere, and more especially those in his native city, will wish him all success in his future career and especially in the arduous duties that will devolve upon him during the present month—duties to which he brings energy, enthusiasm, experience, and ability.

A NEW FESTIVAL COMPOSER.

MR. S. COLERIDGE-TAYLOR.

It is very seldom that a young composer under twenty-three years of age receives the distinction of being asked to compose a work for one of the Festivals. Some people speak of Mr. Coleridge-Taylor, who has thus been favoured, as a "coming man," while there are a few who make bold to say that he has arrived already. At all events, he has merited a very good claim to receive recognition in the columns of The Musical Times as a very gifted musician who has something to say, and, moreover, something worth saying.

Samuel Coleridge-Taylor was born in London on August 15, 1875. His father, a doctor of medicine, was a native of Sierra Leone, on the West coast of Africa, while his mother was an Englishwoman. "None of my people were at all musical from a serious point of view," Mr. Taylor informs us. He began to study music when he was six years old. The violin was his first love, his teacher being Mr. Joseph Beckwith, of Croydon. At the age of ten he became a chorister in St. George's Church, but he has been singing at St. Mary Magdalene Church, Croydon, for the last nine or ten years, where he now sings alto. In 1890, through the kindness of Mr. Herbert A. Walters, Mr. Taylor was enabled to enter the Royal College of Music as a student of the violin. He is now professor of the violin at the Croydon Conservatoire of Music and conductor of the string orchestra there.

But nature intended him for a composer. He instinctively felt it, and the desire literally burned within him. He determined to compete for a composition scholarship at the College, which he won in 1893. Then he applied himself almost exclusively to composition for the next four years, his studies being pursued under Professor Villiers Stanford. Like so many old pupils of the Royal College of Music, Mr. Taylor speaks in terms of warm appreciation of his alma mater.

Like Sir Arthur Sullivan, Mr. Taylor's first published composition is an anthem, a melodious and very vocal setting of the words "In Thee, O Lord, have I put my trust." This was published by Messrs. Novello in 1892, when its composer was only sixteen. Since then, however, he has advanced by leaps and bounds. In the intervening seven years his compositions have reached to Opus 33, many of which have been published. Amongst his most important works are a Nonet for pianoforte, strings, and wind, played at a Royal College concert, July 5, 1894; a Symphony in A minor, conducted by Professor Stanford in St. James's Hall, on March 6, 1896, and subsequently by the composer at Liverpool; a Quintet for clarinet and strings in F sharp minor, introduced in Berlin by Dr. Joachim in 1897; a String Quartet in D minor, and a Morning and Evening Service. The foregoing are all unpublished. The published compositions include a Ballade in D minor for violin and orchestra; four waltzes for orchestra, one of which, we understand, was recently performed with much success before the Queen at Osborne by Her Majesty's private band; an operetta, "Dream Lovers"; three Humoresques for pianoforte; Hiawathan Sketches (three), Two Gipsy Movements, and Danse Nègre, for violin and pianoforte; "In Memoriam" (three Rhapsodies for a low voice and pianoforte); a volume of "Southern Love Songs," and "African Romances" (seven songs), set to words by Mr. Paul Dunbar, the clever negro poet.

Mr. Coleridge-Taylor is a very rapid composer. Like Schubert, he transmits his thoughts to paper straight away with as much, and probably more ease than most people write an ordinary letter. His scores are no less models of neatness than originality. The tiny pin-head notes are in strong contrast to the large ideas they express. We cannot do better than conclude this brief notice of the young composer of three-and-twenty summers with a quotation from a competent critic on Mr. Taylor's remarkable powers as a productive musician. The following "appreciation" was written about a year ago, after hearing some of Mr. Taylor's early instrumental works. "Mr. Taylor, while still a student, reflects neither his teachers' nor anybody else's music, such a case being, perhaps, without precedent in the history of our art. . . . His quick movements are full of tremendous vigour, strange rhythms, and a wild untrammelled gaiety suggestive of neither European nor Oriental influence. An altogether new element seems here introduced into our art, the further development of which we shall watch with the keenest interest. May the fates be kind to Mr. Taylor and give him the fullest opportunities for developing his quite exceptional talent."

One of Mr. Taylor's latest works is a setting of Longfellow's "Hiawatha's Wedding-Feast" for tenor solo, chorus, and orchestra, a fine specimen of his characteristic freshness which distinctly merits the attention of choral societies. The last production of his pen is a Ballade in A minor for orchestra, which he was asked to compose for the Gloucester Musical Festival to be held during the present month. Here is its vigorous opening in the composer's neat handwriting, reproduced in fac-simile, together with his signature :—

THE GLOUCESTER NOVELTIES.

My object in the following remarks is not criticism of the new works about to be produced at the Festival of the Three Choirs. That would be premature. I desire simply to describe, as far as possible in the time and space available, what the chosen composers have prepared for the occasion.

Mr. S. Coleridge-Taylor will be represented by an Orchestral Ballade in A minor (Allegro energico). The work fills twenty pages of the folio pianoforte score, and is distinctly homogeneous as to themes and treatment. Melodic ideas are not abundant, but the few are so elaborated and emphasised by repetition that they serve the purpose of the piece sufficiently well. The modern spirit is easily recognised, while it seems no less evident that a great deal depends upon the nature of the orchestration, which, judging by such indications as a pianoforte version can give, should be brilliant and effective. When I have had an opportunity of making acquaintance with the scoring there will be more to say. At present, I am as one who reads in the twilight.

Mr. A. H. Brewer, conductor of the Festival and organist of Gloucester Cathedral, has prepared for the grand opening service on Sunday, the 11th inst., a setting of Psalm xcviii., "O sing unto the Lord a new song." The music, which stands in seven numbers, all save two wholly or partly choral, is laid out for soli (soprano and bass), chorus, and orchestra. In general character it may be described as embodying to a large extent the restrained and dignified spirit shown in the works of our best Church composers. It exhibits also the contrapuntal forms in which those masters so consistently delighted. But Mr. Brewer is a young musician, and in composing his work he did not forget that it was destined to a place in a festive programme. Hence an infusion, to a certain extent, of a lighter modern style. This, however, is in no case overdone. For all its occasional pliant grace and cheerful animation, there is not a flippant bar in the Psalm. The true, dignified note of Anglican Church music sounds throughout, and is as far from austerity as from a suggestion of the world worldly. Mr. Brewer begins (Allegro moderato, E flat) with a chorus covering the first two verses of the text. To this there is a short orchestral prelude, containing a theme used also in the Coda of the final number. The chorus opens with passages but slightly imitative, for the "voices" in succession, to a free and independent accompaniment. Free imitation (there are but few monophonic passages) is a characteristic of the entire number; the parts in their diversity, however, are one in loftiness of spirit and utterance. The second number (verses 3 and 4), set as a soprano solo in A flat (Larghetto), is one of those tender, quiet, devotional pieces which have ever been gracious to English ears, and by which Mendelssohn especially gained not a little of his popularity amongst us. There is not an atom of self-seeking in this solo. It suggests a composer modestly hidden behind his art, and content there, while his melody flows with the gentleness of a stream on level lands. A singer who feels can make much of this unambitious solo. The third number deals with verse 5, in the form of an exultant chorus (Allegro moderato, C major), opening with freely imitative passages, showing great breadth of style. In a second section, "Sing, rejoice, and give thanks," imitation is preserved, but here Mr. Brewer employs, and that with excellent effect, the old-fashioned "divisions," which composers in general now seem afraid to use. The effect of the rolling passages, taken up by part after part, is thoroughly appropriate and stimulative. A very broad and simply harmonised ensemble brings the number to a fitting climax. Verses 6 and 7, "Praise the Lord upon the harp," &c., is the most elaborate section of the Psalm, employing an orchestral introduction, soprano solo, and chorus. The Introduction is in 9-8 (Andante) and flows gently on with an easy, graceful motion, only once assuming a more energetic attitude. Presumably the scoring is for strings and wood-wind. The solo enters in the same rhythm; its broad phrases attended by passages from the prelude, emphasised, if appearances may be trusted, by harp chords. These characteristics are invariable throughout the section. Entry of the chorus brings a change, the tempo becoming Allegro moderato, and the key, C major. Here the solo soprano acts as prompter, setting phrases which the chorus takes up in full harmony. The expression is vigorous, as becomes the words, "With trumpets also and shawms," &c., and there is no attempt at anything beyond the simplest passages. No. 5, "Let the sea make a noise," appears as a bass solo (Moderato), beginning in F major and passing through various keys. It is of a declamatory character and gives a vigorous singer opportunity for considerable effect. The sixth number, "With righteousness shall He judge the world," a chorus in B flat (Andante), comes fittingly, in its brevity and quietness, between the bass solo and the Finale, both of which are energetic. It opens as an accompanied canon in the octave, smooth-flowing and expressive. This form is not continued throughout. The "Gloria" stands in two sections—an interesting Largo (E flat minor), preceded by a short and stately passage for orchestra, leading to a fugue (Allegro moderato, E flat) on the words, "world without end, Amen." This is admirably developed, but not at great length. The same words serve for a Coda to the entire work—a Coda of much power, and one that fitly closes this hymn of pious gladness. Mr. Brewer is to be congratulated upon his achievement.

Another of the novelties is also a Psalm—the 86th—but Mr. Basil Harwood, its composer, has chosen to use the Latin text, and we are to recognise his work by the title, "Inclina, Domine." Why the Latin text, which is not the original any more than our own stately English version, I do not pretend to know; but, of course, Mr. Harwood was within his right. The Psalm is set in five numbers, for soprano solo, chorus, and orchestra, and marked by much liberality and exuberance in the use of means. The result is music of some difficulty, but whether the resources shown are in excess of the effect produced is a question better left till after the revelation made in performance. The opening chorus (Lento, B flat minor) has sections in four and five parts respectively, but the bulk of it is in double-chorus form. A theme, heavy and gloomy, to which, however, there is considerable relief, figures in the leading sections of the number, followed by a short Maestoso, quasi-Recit. in eight parts, leading to an extended Allegro moderato for double choir. This last division is by far the most important, being elaborated, alike in contrapuntal and in monophonic antiphonal passages, with very considerable skill and knowledge of effect. On the whole, the work opens well. The second number, "Miserere mei, Domine," takes the form of a soprano solo, followed by a brief chorus (Lento, E flat minor). Its rhythmic quality is determined by a liberal use of triplets, in both the voice part and the accompaniment. Of real and expressive melody there is little, and the effect of the song probably depends to a great extent upon the orchestration. The brief chorus (eight parts) is an example of quite simple part-writing, solid and impressive. Coming to the third number, "Non est similis," a very important four-part chorus (Vivace, E flat) arrests attention. The first section, preluded by an orchestral introduction chiefly based upon the leading theme, is in great part contrapuntal, varied by repetitions of a declamatory theme in unison of the male voices. Its design aims at impressiveness, and, I consider, hits the mark squarely and truly. The declamatory passage is a particularly happy thought—a rallying point, so to speak, for any interest that may be lagging or in danger of dispersal. A sustained chord of the dominant minor seventh closes the section. An eight-part fugue on two subjects forms the second division of the number, and gives satisfactory proof of ease and effect in handling elaborate contrapuntal resources. The composer here has no awkward moments. He is always master of his means. Judgment is shown, moreover, when, mid-way in the fugue, a new subject of a broad and striking character is stated and answered in four parts, and afterwards worked in with the earlier themes. The same subject opens the Coda and forms an excellent climax. A soprano solo and chorus, "Deduc me, Domine" (Lento, G major), forms the fourth number. Once or twice, choral passages break in upon the course of the solo, which ripples with triplets, and is quite engaging, as well as proof that Mr. Harwood can, if he likes, write a sustained melody. The chorus passages, as may be supposed, are in keeping with the character of the solo. Later, the melodic nature of the music is less insisted on, and the number ends with a double chorus, "Deus, iniqui insurrexerunt" (Allegro, G minor), which becomes fugal (Più allegro) on the words "et non proposuerunt," &c., and runs a very bright and animated course. Eventually the solo returns with new matter (Allegro moderato) in its train, and so the number ends. In the final chorus, four parts, "Quoniam tu, Domine" (Moderato con moto, B flat), the music is essentially contrapuntal, though in free form; the leading theme, for example, being answered in inversion. It is not, I fear, the movement of highest interest in the work, but that point must be decided in performance. As a whole, the Psalm deserves close attention for various reasons, and places its composer more conspicuously before the public.

Sir Hubert Parry's contribution is a setting of an Ode by Robert Bridges, entitled "A Song of Darkness and Light." I do not find it stated that the poem has been expressly written for music, but that idea is favoured by its division into sections, each dealing with a definite and, as regards surroundings, contrasted theme. On the other hand, it is not supported by lines which are more fitted for deliberate and thoughtful reading than for musical expression. After invoking the "Power eternal," Mr. Bridges discourses upon the mystery of Nature, upon the terror of its destructive manifestations, the peace of its smile, the joy of toil, the beauty of art, the sweetness of compassionate tears, and the power and grandeur of faith. These are lofty themes. Though the poem is in sections, the music runs on without break. The wisdom of this I venture to doubt. With such subjects as the poet treats, and with music as closely reasoned as the verse, one is thankful for a moment of repose and a fresh start in renewed vigour of attention. The music is throughout eminently characteristic of the composer's method and manner. In outline and detail it is familiar to students of other works by the same indefatigable musician, whose prolific labours remind me of the brave doings of old. But while Sir Hubert Parry here tells us little about himself that we do not already know, his masterfulness invests even the familiar with fresh interest. We cannot choose but hear, though he relates no story such as that which, passing strange, held the Wedding Guest in thrall. There are reasons why even descriptive remarks upon the present work should be reserved till the light of a performance has shone upon it; but it is impossible not to see at a glance where the composer drives conviction home to mind and feeling. One such point appears in the "Terror" section, which is throughout remarkably vigorous, powerful, and impressive. It may be said that the beautiful music of the "Peace" section lacks piquancy, but it is beautiful nevertheless, and therefore to be prized in days almost barren of the highest musical good. Sir Hubert Parry touches the highest point, to my mind, in the "Tears" section. We are sometimes told of a vocalist that he has "tears in his voice." They are certainly to be found in these notes. The pathos and tenderness of the music are absolute, and absolute also in mastery of the emotions. The composer has done nothing more moving, nothing more demonstrative of the fact that he is one of the few true minstrels who can make us feel with them in their songs.

My space is exhausted, and the reader, doubtless, has had enough. I therefore reserve what more must needs be said for another opportunity, which, coming after performance, will be a better occasion.

CHURCH MUSIC.

The enterprising proprietors of the Western Mail have conducted, during the past month, a "hymn tune" competition. The words of typical hymns were set forth as subjects for the composers of tunes sent in for competition. The judgment pronounced upon the music thus subjected to inspection has been of a twofold character. The readers of the journal have been supplied with coupons, whereby they could express, from time to time, their opinions upon the tunes as printed, and the musical editor of the paper has also passed judgment of a more critical character. This novel competition has not only been regarded with interest, but has brought forward some excellent specimens of the hymn tune genus. That these results have been attained is perhaps only natural, seeing the revival of hymn tune writing, the many collections of hymn tunes recently issued, the increased interest in music generally and especially in all forms of Church music.

Concerning the use of Kalliwoda's Mass in A in churches of the Roman Communion, an esteemed correspondent calls attention to an English adaptation now frequently used at All Saints', Margaret Street, and St. Paul's, Knightsbridge.

The recent report of the committee of the Church Orchestral Society gives gratifying evidence of good work gradually gaining deserved recognition. There are features of special interest in the Society's statement of the past year. For instance, we learn that the Society is now prepared to supply not only its own complete orchestra as a whole, but to send to the aid of Church authorities any required number of players, amateur or professional, as may be applied for. This resolution is well calculated to increase the usefulness, influence, and popularity of this excellent Association. The work of the Society will be further expedited by the forthcoming publication of a list of Church music available for orchestral use.

On the 3rd ult. another "Musical Service," consisting of popular hymns, vocal pieces, and organ solos, was given in St. David's Cathedral. Remote as this stately old church is from the busy tides of life, it has happily become, by the earnestness, energy, and good taste of the Cathedral authorities, including the enthusiastic and excellent organist, a musical centre of already no small account, and with every indication of great future usefulness.

An interesting and decidedly useful conference of the organists and choirmasters constituting the Salisbury Diocesan Choral Association was held in the Church House, Salisbury, on July 23, under the presidency of Precentor Carpenter. After a few words of welcome, the chairman introduced to the meeting Dr. Varley Roberts, organist of Magdalen College, Oxford, who had been invited to speak to them on the subject of choir-training. In the course of an interesting and practical address, Dr. Roberts said that boys with coarse and rough voices should be rejected, for a boy with a coarse voice and vulgar pronunciation would spoil a host. As to the importance of cultivating a boy's intelligence, he remarked that he had always found it well to take the advice of an old friend of his, who was a great teacher—never to ask a question which merely required "Yes" or "No" for an answer, but to try to draw a little speech or phrase from the student. Speaking of choirs as a whole, Dr. Roberts made some excellent observations on organ accompaniments. He said that many choirs were ruined by loud organ playing. He had heard some organists playing with almost every stop in their instrument out. If he had his way he would give such men only one stop to play on, and that would be the dulciana! A choir would never sing well if the organ were played as loudly as it could possibly be made to sound. Let the organ accompany the singing. There was no greater compliment which could be paid to an organist than to say to him, "Really I had to listen for the organ." He firmly believed that big organs were the ruin of choirs.

Digitized by Google

Dr. Roberts called special attention to the fact that, as a rule, choirs chanted much too fast. The words must always be distinctly articulated. The true aim of the choirmaster should be to train his choir to render the ordinary services well, and not to bother about anthems. Mr. C. F. South, organist of the Cathedral, proposed a vote of thanks to the organist of Magdalen College for the excellent advice he had given to those who were present—words of wisdom which deserved a larger audience than that assembled at Salisbury on that interesting occasion. The organists and choirmasters subsequently attended Evensong in the Cathedral, when Mr. South gave a short recital on Willis's fine organ. Precentor and Mrs. Carpenter afterwards entertained the visitors to tea at their residence in the Close. Might not the example of the Salisbury Association be followed with advantage?

Mr. J. Sewell will celebrate his "Jubilee" as organist of St. Leonard's Church, Bridgenorth, on Sunday, the 25th inst.

ORGAN MUSIC.

CONCERT-ROOM organs are still being multiplied, and such important additions to our chief music rooms and town halls are, indeed, to be welcomed. The new organ built by Messrs. E. F. Walcker and Co., of Ludwigsburg, Germany, and Berners Street, London, for the Central Hall, Corporation Street, Birmingham, is a matter of interest to lovers of the instrument. The admirable and well thought-out specification has been drawn up by Mr. C. W. Perkins, who will open the new three-manual instrument on the first of the present month. The well selected sounding stops number 35. It is important to note that of the 29 stops assigned to the manuals 17 are of 8 feet, yielding a large amount of variety at the unison pitch. This is a further evidence of a highly satisfactory development alluded to more than once in these columns. One can only regret, however, that so perfect a scheme should lack a stop of 32 feet range on the pedal organ of 6 stops. The harmonic scheme of no organ with 16 feet stops on the manuals can be considered fully satisfactory without a 32 feet register on the pedal. There are no less than 20 mechanical movements in the scheme of this notable instrument.

Of recent recitals, mention may be made of one by Dr. Ely, at Christ Church, Scarborough, which included Rheinberger's Suite in C minor for organ, violin, and violoncello, and Marche Religieuse (Saint-Saëns); another, given at St. Petroc's, Bodmin, by Mr. W. L. Twining, the scheme of which included Dr. A. L. Peace's "Sonata da camera," No. 2; by Mr. Frank Pullein, on the 4th ult., at Christ Church, Llanfairfechan, the scheme of which contained "Meditation" (Jackson) and "Idylle" (Dudley-Buck); by Mr. R. Sharpe, at St. Mary's, Southampton, with Boellmann's Suite Gothique as a prominent feature of a good programme; and a series given at Holy Trinity Church, Wensley, during the past month, by Messrs. Hugh M. Lawrence, W. Ellis, C. H. Kitson, and F. J. P. Drake, whose programmes included: Scherzo (W. S. Hoyte), Meditation and Toccata (E. d'Evry), Sonata, No. 4 (Rheinberger), Grand Chœur (Hollins), Toccata, Symphony, No. 5 (Widor), Andante (Benoist), and Bach's Fugue in D, a work not too often played.

During the past month Mr. Herbert C. Morris has given a series of weekly organ recitals, in St. David's Cathedral, with well-selected programmes. It is noteworthy that the collections are given to the Church Choir Excursion Fund; an arrangement creditable to all concerned and deserving of imitation. The programme of Mr. A. A. Mackintosh's recital, with violin and vocal selections, at Godalming Parish Church, on the 16th ult., included Adagio in D, Otto Dienel; Romance in D flat, E. H. Lemare; and Fantasia in E minor, Silas.

Mendelssohn's recently published two organ pieces (posthumous) seem to be rapidly growing into favour. The Andante with variations in D was played by Mr. Seymour Dicker, at the Royal Albert Hall, on Sunday, the 21st ult., and by Dr. Thomas Ely, at Christ Church, Scarborough, on the 17th of last month. Mr. Dicker's programme also included the Finale from Tschaïkowsky's Symphonie Pathétique, arranged by Mr. Charles Macpherson, and Sir Alexander Mackenzie's Benedictus, performed on the violin by Mr. Samuel Barker.

Mr. E. H. Lemare's interesting recitals at St. Margaret's, Westminster, re-commence on October 1, and will be continued on subsequent Saturdays.

REVIEWS.

Novello's Parish Choir Book. Nos. 358-360, 362-369. [Novello and Company, Limited.]

THIS valuable series shows no falling off in utility or excellence. No. 358 consists of Sir Arthur Sullivan's stately hymn-tune "Bishopgarth," printed on a card, in which form it will doubtless prove acceptable. No. 359 is a re-issue of Edward Mammatt's setting of the Cantate Domino and Deus Misereatur, canticles which are unduly neglected in many churches. Choirmasters who do not already know this arrangement may be recommended to include it in their repertory. The Cantate comprises a duet for soprano and tenor, occupying a page, and also a short passage for bass solo. The Deus Misereatur is in four vocal parts throughout, but the last two verses are intended for a single or double quartet, which would provide effective contrast for the Gloria. "The Parish Hymn," written by the Rev. W. Cunliffe and composed by Sir George C. Martin, provides No. 360, and may be warmly recommended to the clergy, and seems to suggest a new field in which music can assist the cementing of Christian fellowship. Sir George Martin's simple strains have much in common with the nature of a chorale, and the well-known power which melody possesses to fix in the memory associated words can scarcely fail to impress Mr. Cunliffe's salutary lines. The same composer contributes No. 362, described as "a short festival Te Deum in A." This proves to be the setting specially written "for the thanksgiving services at St. Paul's Cathedral, in celebration of the sixtieth year of Her Majesty's reign," and it will therefore be sufficient to say that esteem for the work increases with more intimate acquaintance. A melodious and effective setting in D of the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis, by Boyton Smith, forms No. 363, and may be recommended to the attention of choirmasters whose forces are of limited abilities. The first verse of the Nunc dimittis may be sung as a solo by soprano or tenor, the other voices entering, but in unison, at the words "For mine eyes." The last verse might be sung as a quartet. The Gloria is differently set in each canticle, that of the latter terminating in a three-fold Amen. In 364 the Lord's Prayer has been simply but impressively harmonised in A, in four vocal parts, intended to be sung unaccompanied, by J. T. Field. No. 365, entitled "Let all our brethren join in one," is a stirring hymn for harvest thanksgiving, the words written by A. C. Ainger and the music composed by the late Sir Joseph Barnby. The hymn should be heard in many churches this autumn, for the lines are rational and hearty and the melody of the refrain has a ring and a swing that echoes completely the genuine sentiment of the words. No. 366 provides an expressive setting, by C. H. Purday, of Newman's beautiful hymn "Lead, kindly Light." The music is well fitted for congregational use, and could easily be sung unaccompanied even by those of little skill in choral singing. No. 367, the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis, has been set in what may be termed free chant form in E flat, by Boyton Smith. The organ simply doubles the four vocal parts, and unanimity in pronunciation of the words is secured by certain syllables being printed in italics. A paraphrase in G of the "Anima Christi" (prayer of St. Ignatius), set to music by William H. Stocks, provides No. 368, and will doubtless prove very acceptable. The music is written in four vocal parts and is in happy consonance with the devotional spirit of the text. No. 369 is Merbecke's "Office of the Holy Communion," harmonised by Sir John Stainer, and is an edition that may be warmly recommended to those to whom the widely known music appeals. The people's part is printed in the old notation on a four-line stave, but the harmonies are given in modern fashion and the words are printed between the two staves. The size in which it is issued will also be found convenient.

The Music-Dramas of Richard Wagner, and his Festival Theatre in Bayreuth. By Albert Lavignac, Professor of Harmony at the Paris Conservatoire. Translated by Esther Singleton. [Service and Paton.]

This work (its original French title is "Le Voyage Artistique à Bayreuth") may be confidently spoken of as one of the very best among the many popular descriptions of Wagner's works and aims and their result as exhibited at Bayreuth, now available. Its author, though an enthusiastic admirer of the Meister, is in no sense one of those blind worshippers whose ill-regulated zeal is responsible for so much of the hostility experienced by the Wagner cause. On the contrary, M. Lavignac is at particular pains to point out, in a section of his volume containing a classification of the various types of "admirers of Wagner," that "In order to be justified in boasting that we really and thoroughly understand Wagner we must be convinced that we understand (I say understand in the sense of appreciating—I do not say admire) everything which worthily preceded him in the evolution of the art. And he who pretends to understand only Wagner, who impertinently rejects the works of our great contemporaries as unworthy of his attention, thinking that by so doing he confers upon himself a mark of high musical intelligence, proves only one thing, that he understands nothing whatever." In this thoroughly healthy spirit our author examines, analyzes, and describes the life of Wagner, the inception of the Bayreuth theatre, and the ideals there aimed at (not, alas! always realised), the plots and spiritual meaning of the dramas of "Tannhäuser," "Lohengrin," "Tristan," "Die Meistersinger," "Parsifal," and "Der Ring des Nibelungen," their musical structure, their interpretation, the inner life of Bayreuth at festival time, and so on. A number of illustrations, comprising views, portraits, and diagrams, nearly three hundred examples in music type of the "leading motives," together with exhaustive lists of these and the points at which they appear, lists of the characters and of the artists who have interpreted them at the Bayreuth theatre since its opening in 1876, and much miscellaneous historical, statistical, and biographical information connected with the subject are given, so that the volume forms a handy reference book, well deserving a place in the library of music-lovers. M. Lavignac has the happy knack of dealing with difficult subjects in an untechnical and chatty style, and his translator has been fairly successful in allowing his literary merits to be felt even in their English dress. The volume is well printed, but it sadly needs an index. This should be supplied in the next edition.

Novello's Octavo Anthems (Harvest). Nos. 599-603. [Novello and Company, Limited.]

The latest additions to this series of anthems, which so admirably maintains the high standard of English Church music, are five intended for harvest festivals, all of which may be warmly recommended to the attention of choirmasters at this season of the year. No. 599 is a setting, by the Rev. E. Vine Hall, of the first two verses of Psalm cvi., "O give thanks unto the Lord," and No. 381 of "Hymns Ancient and Modern." The compositions of the former Precentor of Worcester Cathedral are well known in many parishes, and the present anthem is an excellent example of his skill in obtaining effective results by simple means. The music is jubilant and stirring, as it should be for such a festival; but the vocal part-writing could be sung correctly at sight by a choir of ordinary musical abilities. The setting contains no solos, but passages in unison for some of the voices are met with, which provide effective contrast to the otherwise prevailing four-part vocal harmony. No. 600, "There shall be an heap of corn," words arranged and written by Henry Knight, music by Ferris Tozer, will also present few difficulties to a fairly competent choir. It is chiefly written in four vocal parts, which are mostly doubled by the organ; but it contains a soprano solo that occupies a page of the score, and in the last section of the anthem the voices sing in unison, Adagio, against a bold organ accompaniment, with dignified and striking effect. The next anthem, No. 601, is entitled "Unto Thee, O God, do we give thanks," and has been composed by Bruce Steane. This also contains a soprano solo, but only of twelve bars' duration. The remainder of the work is written in four vocal parts, which are very bright, easy to read at sight, and grateful to sing. Triple measure chiefly prevails, and the organ part possesses considerable freedom, while at the same time it well supports the voices. No. 602, "Great is our Lord," composed by Myles B. Foster, is more contrapuntal in character, and comprises a tenor solo of some importance which extends over two pages. The anthem is a good specimen of its composer's earnest and finished style, and any difficulties which may be found in the chorus parts are calculated to increase the interest of well-trained singers. No. 603, "Sing unto the Lord," by Cuthbert Harris, is a remarkably spirited and vigorous composition, laid out for full choir throughout, and furnished with an organ accompaniment which considerably increases the effectiveness of the anthem. Although the music imperatively demands unanimity and vigour of attack, it is well within the abilities of average church choirs.

'Tis all but a dream at the best. Ballad. By Thomas Moore. Arranged by William Nicholl.

The Auld Fisher. Words by George Macdonald. Music by William Nicholl.

Mignonette. Poppies. Songs. Words by Florence Hoar. Music by Joseph Roeckel.

[Robert Cocks and Co.]

As may be anticipated, the two first of the above songs, coming from the pen of so finished a singer, are admirably laid out for the voice, and the accompaniments, although very simple, form a satisfactory and artistic background to the vocal part. The words of "The Auld Fisherman" are somewhat depressing, but there is a ring of genuine pathos in the resignation of the worn-out toiler of the sea who looks forward to a place "Whaur the bairns com' hame, An' the wives they bide, An' God is the Father of a'!"

"Mignonette" and "Poppies" are Nos. 1 and 2 of a series entitled "Flower Songs," and are unpretentious but poetical little lyrics, in which pleasing fancy is allied to bright and genial music.

Cradle Song. Words and music by Maude Valérie White.

Sonnet. Words by Mowbray Marras. Music by F. Paolo Tosti.

Dan Cupid and Doctor Reason. Words by A. Patchett Martin. Music by Guglielmo Lardelli.

[G. Ricordi and Co.]

Miss Valérie White's "Cradle Song" is an excellent example of its class. The words express the joy of motherhood with playful but unaffected earnestness, and the music has the lilt and simplicity in which the ideal baby is supposed to revel with crowing delight.

Signor Tosti has a style of his own, and it is much in evidence, with pleasing results, in the setting of Mr. Marras's Sonnet, the sentiment of which may be described as the male version of the damsel who "never told her love." The music is easy to sing and play, and the vocal part is laid out for a tenor voice, although, as it is obligingly issued in three keys, sentimental basses are not excluded.

"Dan Cupid and Doctor Reason" is a merry little ditty, the musical interest of which is considerably heightened by an ingenious and flowing accompaniment.

MUSIC IN BIRMINGHAM.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE Birmingham Festival Choral Society's fifty-second annual report was presented to its members on July 27. The statement of accounts showed a loss of £40 6s. 4d. on last season's concerts. The scheme for next season will consist of three choral and three orchestral concerts, following the example of last season, the dates being October 15, November 10, December 1, 1898; January 26, February 23, and March 16, 1899, to which must be added the annual performance of "The Messiah" on Boxing night. The choral works decided upon are Berlioz's "Faust," Max Bruch's "The Lay of the Bell," Beethoven's "Mount of Olives," and Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise." The orchestral works will include Tschaïkowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony, Mozart's "Jupiter," and Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphonies. The choir will also take part at each orchestral concert.

The eighteenth annual meeting of the Midland Musical Society was held on July 28. The committee stated that a profit of £26 6s. 4d. had been made on the season's working. Mr. H. M. Stevenson was re-elected honorary conductor. The works to be produced this season are Mendelssohn's "Elijah" and "St. Paul," but the work for the third concert has not yet been decided upon. The annual performance of Gounod's "Redemption" will take place on Good Friday, as usual.

As far as I have been able to ascertain, the musical fixtures for the coming autumn and winter are likely to far exceed last season's eventful doings. The present scheme, in addition to the Festival Choral Society's programme, will also comprise a season of promenade concerts, popular oratorio performances for the masses, ballad, drawing-room, and chamber concerts, ten grand orchestral concerts to be given by Mr. George Halford, four orchestral concerts under Dr. Rowland Winn, and four popular subscription concerts under the Messrs. Harrison régime. To these must be added a number of popular Saturday night concerts, provided by well known local professors and musical entrepreneurs, concerts by the Birmingham Choral and Orchestral Association, under Mr. Joseph H. Adams's conductorship, and the concerts given by the Birmingham Choral Union, under Mr. Thomas Facer.

MUSIC IN LIVERPOOL.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

IT is now officially stated that, during the coming season, the Philharmonic Society will follow the lines recorded in these columns a month ago. The contrast of Verdi's "Stabat Mater" with Rossini's setting of the same hymn will be interesting, as both are included in the scheme, though it would have been more in accordance with the conventionalisms of chronology had the work of the Swan of Pesaro come first instead of last. Handel's "Israel in Egypt" will be welcome after the lapse of nearly twenty years, and Beethoven's "Ruins of Athens" and Cowen's "Water Lily" will prove acceptable to the subscribers, if only for the reason that both are compositions out of the beaten track which almost from time immemorial the premier Society has loved to follow.

It is a pity that, with a new conductor—and it would be difficult to find one more competent than Mr. F. H. Crossley—the Liverpool Musical Society is able to offer to its subscribers nothing more novel than "Elijah," "Messiah," and "The Redemption," all of which have been given on previous occasions by the same organisation. As all the works named are, however, well known to the choristers, exceptionally good performances will, therefore, be expected.

MUSIC IN PARIS.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THERE is scarcely anything to record, worth speaking of, in matters musical at present. At the Opéra the familiar works on the repertory are being alternately given, pending the production of some new work. If rumour may be trusted, the next novelty to be brought out is an opera, "Lancelot," by M. Joncières, the librettists of which, MM. Louis Gallet and Edouard Blau, have taken their subject from one of Tennyson's Idylls. At the Théâtre Lyrique the first performance in Paris took place, towards the end of July, of M. Spiro Samara's three-act opera "La Martyre." The composer, a native of Illyria, is a former pupil of Leo Délibes, but he really belongs to the modern Italian school. His score abounds in deliberate effects, manifestly intended to impress the audience, and they certainly succeed in doing so. The subject, moreover, with its alternately dramatic and comic situations (the librettist is Signor Luigi Illica), affords the composer every opportunity for varied treatment, and the reception accorded to the work by a numerous audience was a very favourable one. Mesdames Dhasty and Milliaud, MM. Martapoura and Henriot were excellent interpreters of the principal parts.

On July 24 we had the "Couronnement de la Muse," a species of popular musical festival introduced to the capital by the composer M. Charpentier, and in which the orchestra of the Conservatoire, the bands of the Garde Républicaine and of the 29th regiment of the Line, and the chorus of the Opéra and of the Opéra Comique assisted. The performances took place in the open air, in the Place de l'Hôtel de Ville, and in the presence of at least fifty thousand people. The music consisted entirely of compositions by the originator of the scheme.

The distribution of prizes took place in the customary manner last month at the Conservatoire. The Fine Arts Minister, in his address, expressed the hope that ere long a new habitation may be found for the great national Institution.

CHURCH MUSIC IN AMERICA.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

IN listening to Church choirs of various kinds, one is forced to admit that, speaking generally, we seem to have lost sight of some of the fundamental principles which underlie all sacred music. Taking the country as a whole, and bearing in mind all the divided phases of religious thought that exist and all the different conditions of climate, tradition, and ways of living, any great uniformity in Church music can hardly be expected. But we ought, as a people, to have and to maintain a few well established principles as to what Church music really is.

In one respect we are pretty much agreed. It is generally acknowledged that popular songs, operatic selections, and familiar pianoforte pieces should have no place in the Church.

In regard to the actual state of affairs, in the small towns throughout the Eastern States, Church music is practically limited to good hymn singing, with occasionally an anthem, sung by a voluntary choir. But in many parts of the country that unmixed evil, the quartet choir, is strongly in evidence; and it is no exaggeration to say that the performances of these people are little short of ludicrous. In Boston and New York the quartet choir is made up of highly paid soloists who sing music which distinctly belongs to the concert-room or the stage. In other words, the real purpose of Church music has, in this reprehensible manner, been entirely prostituted.

The number of boy choirs is increasing, and they are to be found in nearly all the large towns and cities; but a service which is well and devotionally sung is, unfortunately, comparatively rare. In New York two of our best known churches have services of a spectacular sort, which, however, leaves an impression on the worshipper far from devotional. The best services are at Trinity, Trinity Chapel, St. Agnes, and Calvary. Each is in keeping with its own surroundings, and nothing is done for mere display and effect. Professor Horatio Parker is organist and choirmaster at Trinity Church, Boston, where there is a choir of men and women which is quite in keeping with the traditions of the church whose history is so closely identified with Phillips Brooks. There are excellent boy choirs at St. Paul and The Advent, Boston, and here and there in the middle States really fine services may be heard. Whatever may be said about the shortcomings of New York in the matter of orchestral music, it is not to be denied that we have the best trainers of boy choirs and that their influence is far reaching and beneficial.

Digitized by Google

The general standard of efficiency has, on the whole, been gradually raised. In the neighbourhood of New York and many other large cities the best choirmasters go out to train other choirs, and so far as the Protestant Episcopal Church is concerned there are encouraging prospects of a better state of things in the future. But in churches of other denominations the outlook is not so encouraging. For instance, the hymnals which are used in such churches are often crudely edited and full of silly, trivial melodies which should have no place in church at all. Moreover, there is absolutely no uniformity in regard to the musical part of the service. It is difficult to say why the governing bodies of these various churches have hitherto done nothing at all effectual to remedy this want of uniformity. One thing, however, is certain, that in those churches where the congregations have an opportunity of hearing really good anthems they never fail to appreciate them.

No one who is unfamiliar with the general aspect of American conditions can have any idea of the obstacles in the way of the development of good Church music. First and foremost there is no binding law as to the form which the musical part of the service shall take. Choirmasters are unrestrained, and, as many of them have not been thoroughly educated in their profession, they are unable to make a suitable selection of anthems, &c. Again, singers are not easily secured, and from the general lack of discipline and devotion to the work for its own sake, it is very difficult to maintain a high standard in the music selected. The choir libraries are encumbered by a mass of cheap music, the compositions of men who are absolutely unqualified to write anything worthy of being sung in divine worship, and, moreover, publishers flood the country with books of trivial anthems at low prices.

But slowly and surely the leaven is working. Country choirmasters are enquiring for anthems by the best Church composers, and it is only a question of time when a real reform will be inaugurated. For, be it remembered, we are a music-loving nation. In witness, therefore, we may point to our crowded symphony concerts and operas, our almost universal custom of teaching children to play upon some instrument, and the serious attention which we devote to the important subject of singing in the public schools.

What we want is some concerted and well directed effort on the part of our leading men towards a general reform. Choirmasters everywhere, as well as the community at large, could easily be influenced; but whatever is attempted must be comprehensive and catholic enough to take in the whole people. For one has only to go a little below the surface of American life to find that, in spite of our seeming diversity, we are really one people drawing closer and closer in affinity as the years pass on, and thus evolving an American spirit which shall find its full expression in every phase of our existence—in Church music as in everything else that is noble, good, and true in our national life.

AT the National Co-operative Festival, held at the Crystal Palace, on the 20th ult., music formed a prominent feature. As results of the adult choir contests, under Class A, Earl Grey's challenge shield was awarded to the Bradford Co-operative Society's Company. In Class B the marks assigned are respectively appended in the following order of merit, attained by each Co-operative Society named. Talke, 92, obtaining first prize of six guineas and the silver medal; Huddersfield, 82, obtaining second prize of three guineas and the bronze medal. Bedminster, 76; Woollaston, 72; Stratford (Essex), 70; Enfield, 68. The junior choir contest, adjudicated by Mr. A. L. Cowley, resulted as follows for the respective companies of Co-operative Societies: Portsea Island, 1, winning the silver challenge shield, presented by Mr. J. S. Curwen, the other competing Societies being awarded certificates in their respective orders of merit: Gravesend, 2; Talke, 3; Dover, 4; Stantonbury, 5; Bradford-on-Avon, 6; Cross Keys, 7. The musical contests also included "children's musical drill," which the companies from Brighton and Woolwich Co-operative Societies went through in excellent style, though awards in this department were not prescribed. The usual concert was given on the grand orchestra with customary success.

MR. GRANVILLE BANTOCK continues to give his excellent daily concerts at the New Brighton Tower. On the 26th ult. a special British concert was given, when the programme consisted of the following selections: Imperial March, Elgar; Festival Overture, Speer; Nocturne from "Romeo and Juliet," German; Orchestral scenes from "Endymion," Hinton; Gavotte, John E. West; Four Characteristic Waltzes, Coleridge-Taylor; and Overture, "In Praise of Scottis Poesie," Wallace. On the 28th ult. Rubinstein's "Ocean" Symphony was performed in its entirety—seven movements. Moreover, the daily programmes are admirably selected and much above the average of such entertainments at English watering-places in the holiday season.

A FOUR weeks' course of practice and study for students of music who wish to become orchestral conductors, trainers of church choirs and choral societies, class teachers of voice production, sight singing, harmony, counterpoint, orchestration, &c., has just been concluded in London at the Tonic Sol-fa College. In every branch the students, as well as studying, are practised in teaching. Under guidance they wield the baton before bands, choirs, and classes, give theory lessons, &c. The professors have included Dr. McNaught, Messrs. L. C. Venables, George Oakey, S. Filmer Rook, A. L. Cowley, W. H. Bonner, and W. T. Samuel; Mr. Curwen and Mr. Griffiths directing the proceedings. Students from England, Scotland, Wales, and Germany have attended.

INTERESTING recitals of Gluck's "Orfeo," in English, were given, on July 26 and 27, by the operatic class of the London Organ School, under the direction of Mr. Stapoffski. Miss May Coleman displayed a fine voice and good style in the music of Orfeo, Miss Amélie Molitor sang with excellent taste the part of Eurydice, and Miss Lowe did creditably in the small part of Love. The choral portions were well sung by other students of the School, and the accompaniments were played by a small string band, selected from the orchestral class, the performances reflecting much credit upon the conductor. Earlier in the month a highly creditable display was given by the elocution students, under the direction of Mr. Charles Fry.

AN interesting and little-known portrait of Chopin has been excellently reproduced in permanent photography by Mr. Augustin Rischgitz, The Studios, Linden Gardens, Bayswater. The original is a drawing from life by F. X. Winterhalter, dated "2 Mai, 1847," two years before the composer's death. It was given by Chopin to his friend and pupil Gutmann, by whom it was bequeathed to its present owner. This portrait is mentioned by Professor Niecks in his "Life of Chopin," Vol. II., p. 344.

DURING the recent annual meeting of the Allgemeiner Deutscher Musik-Verein, held at Mayence, an Association was formed for the protection of the rights of German composers in the performance of their works. Dr. Oscar von Hase, the chief of the firm of Breitkopf and Härtel, of Leipzig, has been appointed its president. A similar society has likewise been founded in Vienna, on the part of Austrian composers and publishers, and at Budapest, on the part of Hungary.

A "NATIONAL Convention of Music Teachers" is announced to be held in Edinburgh on the 15th, 16th, and 17th inst., under the presidency of Mr. J. Spencer Curwen. Mr. Hamish MacCunn will be the chairman at the opening meeting, to be held in the Music Classroom, Edinburgh University, on Thursday evening, the 15th, at 7 p.m. The hon. secretary is Mr. Thomas Watson, 160, Montgomery Street, Edinburgh.

THE following awards were made at the conclusion of the Midsummer Term of the Royal College of Music:—Council Exhibitions of £10 each: Lenora Sparkes and Agatha Macken (singing), Edith E. Stapley and Helen M. Egerton (violin), and Edward Mason (violoncello). Council Exhibition of £15, in the junior department: Ethel M. Brigstock (pianoforte). London Musical Society's Prize (value £3 3s.) for singing: Muriel Foster (scholar).

A GARDEN party was given by Mr. J. E. Holloway, at his residence on Denmark Hill, to the members of the Denmark Hill Musical Society, on July 28, when a handsome marble clock, with a suitable inscription, was presented to Dr. Warriner, the conductor of the Society, as a token of its appreciation. Mrs. Warriner was the recipient of a carriage clock on the same interesting occasion.

Two open Scholarships at the Royal Academy of Music—the Erard Centenary Pianoforte Scholarship and the Erard Centenary Harp Scholarship—will be competed for early in next month. The successful candidates will be entitled to receive three years' free tuition at the Royal Academy of Music. Particulars may be obtained of the secretary.

THE conductorship of the well known New York Male Choral Society "Liederkranz" has been conferred upon Dr. Paul Klengel, the present musical director of the Leipzig Singakademie, in the room of Herr Heinrich Zöllner, who, on his part, has accepted an important appointment in Leipzig.

HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN has been graciously pleased to accept the dedication of Mr. Edward Elgar's new cantata "Caractacus," composed expressly for the forthcoming Leeds Musical Festival.

MESSRS. NICHOLSON AND COMPANY, organ builders, of Worcester, supplied the organ used at the Royal National Eisteddfod recently held at Blaenau Festiniog.

FOREIGN NOTES.

BERLIN.—The four hundredth performance of "Tannhäuser" was recorded at the Royal Opera on the 3rd ult. The noble work was first produced here on January 7, 1856, nearly eleven years after its original production at Dresden, and after its having already made the round of all the other important German theatres. According to the interesting statistical report just published, the number of performances during last year, at the Royal Opera, was 264; amongst these, Wagner was represented by 62, Mozart by 26, Weber by 9, and Beethoven (with his only opera) by 5 performances. Herr Kienzl's new tragi-comic opera, "Don Quixote," is to be brought out in the course of next month as the first novelty of the season, with Frau Schumann-Heink and Herr Bulss in the principal parts.——A very active season is foreshadowed by the new operatic management of the West-end Theatre, where, amongst other works of peculiar interest, Haydn's "The Apothecary," Weber's "Sylvana," and Tschaïkowsky's "Eugène Onegin" are in course of being mounted. The first performance took place at this theatre, on the 1st ult., of a lyrical-drama, in four acts, entitled "Pergolesi," whereof Signor Tasca (whose opera "A Santa Lucia" was successfully produced in this capital some few years since) is the composer. The new work met with a very good reception.——The members of the University of Upsala Choral Society, under the directorship of Herr Ivar Hedenblad, recently paid a most successful visit to this capital, where their fresh voices and excellent training excited much admiration.——English friends of that gifted lady, Miss Marie Wurm, will be interested to learn that she has been appointed to the conductorship of the Ladies' Orchestral Society recently formed in the German capital.

BLANKENBERGHE.—Amongst the number of musical artists who are recruiting just now at this popular seaside resort are M. Gevaert, the director of the Brussels Conservatoire; Herr Edvard Lassen, the Weimar composer; and the pianists Emil Sauer and Franz Rummel. Herr Sauer, by the way, is furbishing up his repertory here with a view to his projected extensive concert tour in the United States in the late autumn; and for an hour or two, morning and evening, loungers on the Place de l'Eglise are treated to a gratuitous recital on the part of the celebrated virtuoso.

BRUSSELS.—The new season of opera at the Théâtre de la Monnaie, which was announced to open in the first week of the present month, promises to be one of considerable interest. Amongst first performances here will be included Wagner's "Das Rheingold" and Puccini's "La Bohème," while M. J. Blockx's "La Princesse d'Auberge," which met with such high favour last season at Antwerp, is likewise to be given for the first time in the Belgian capital. An interesting revival will be that of Weber's "Oberon"—a work so seldom produced nowadays—and a series of performances is also promised of "Die Walküre," with Miss Brema in the part of Brünnhilde, the lady being a prime favourite with the public here.

BUENOS AYRES.—Leoncavallo's "I Medici" was produced for the first time here on July 29, by the Italian Opera Company, under Signor Mugnori's direction, and was very enthusiastically received. Frau von Ehrenstein and Signor Tamagno were in the principal parts, and the press organs speak in highly laudatory terms both of the work itself and its performance. Critics here, by the way, have a knack of expressing themselves in language at once picturesque and the reverse of veiled. Thus, after the recent production of a new operetta, "The jolly Marchioness," the critic of a local journal, speaking, he felt convinced, "in the name of the great majority of the audience," declared the authors of the work to be "fit candidates for a lunatic asylum," and the director, who perpetrated its performance, to have "merited a few years of service on the galleys." If it be of the essence of candour to be outspoken, here, without doubt, we have the genuine article.

CARLSRUHE.—Special operatic performances are announced to be given at the Court Theatre, under Herr Mottl's direction, from September 9 to October 16, among the works to be produced being "Beatrice et Benedict" and "Les Troyens" (both parts) by Berlioz; Wagner's "Die Meistersinger," "Tristan und Isolde," and the "Nibelungen" tetralogy; and a scenic representation of Liszt's "St. Elizabeth."

DRESDEN.—The Royal Conservatorium, one of the most flourishing of the numerous similar institutions in Germany, has recently published its forty-second annual report. According to this, the number of pupils during the past academical year was 1,034 of various nationalities, including seventy-four British, thirty-two Americans, and twenty-one Russians. Some sixty performances, operatic, dramatic, and purely musical, in which both professors and pupils took part, were given during the year. An interesting historical essay from the pen of Herr C. H. Döring, respecting the "Invention of the Hammer-Klavier," is appended to this altogether most carefully compiled report.——Fräulein Therese Malten, the gifted vocalist and interpreter of Wagnerian heroines, was last month the recipient of numerous congratulations and substantial tokens of esteem on the occasion of the twenty-fifth anniversary of her membership of the Royal Opera.

FLORENCE.—The Baron Franchetti, according to Italian journals, is now engaged upon an opera entitled "Germania," having for its subject the German wars of liberation against Napoleon I., and introducing some of the leading statesmen and generals of the period. It will probably be first brought out at the Royal Opera, Berlin. Field Marshal "Forwards," in the character of an operatic hero, should prove a distinct revelation to Berlin audiences.

KÖNIGSBERG.—Professor C. H. Cornhill, of the theological faculty at the University, is the poet-composer of an opera entitled "Saul," which will be brought out during next season at the Hamburg Stadt-Theater.

LEIPZIG.—Dr. Hugo Riemann, the well-known musical author and lexicographer, was able last month to look back upon twenty-five years of ceaseless activity in the cause of musical art. The Weekblad voor Muziek, of Amsterdam, devotes an entire double number to a series of articles on his reformatory efforts in the field of musical science. The eminent theorist has just completed his forty-ninth year.——A new three-act opera by Herr Waldemar von Baussnern, entitled "Albrecht Dürer in Venice," has just been published by Messrs. Breitkopf and Härtel, and will probably be first brought out at the Dresden Opera.——The composer Theodore Gouvy, whose death in this city was announced recently, has bequeathed the sum of 10,000 marks to the Royal Academy of Arts of Berlin, the interest on which is to be applied annually in aid of some deserving musician in poor circumstances.

LIÈGE.—M. Ovide Musin has been appointed to the violin professorship at the Conservatoire, lately vacated by M. César Thompson. M. Musin has only recently established an academy for violin playing at New York, which he will be permitted to continue to personally conduct during six months of the year.

Milan.—It is now definitely announced that satisfactory arrangements as to its financial status having at length been made, the historical theatre, Della Scala, will re-open its doors, on December 26, with a performance of "Die Meistersinger." The season, which bids fair to be a brilliant one, will include representations of Verdi's "Otello," with Signor Tamagno in the leading part, Meyerbeer's "Les Huguenots," and Signor Mascagni's "Iris."

Munich.—Herr Richard Strauss is said to be engaged upon an important symphonic work in four movements, to be entitled "Heroic Life" ("Heldenleben"), which is to be produced at one of the Museum concerts, in Frankfurt-on-Main, next season.——An amusing incident recently occurred at a performance of "Die Zauberflöte" at the Royal Theatre. Just previous to the performance an important personage—to wit, the prompter—had suddenly become ill, for the first time during his long occupancy of the post, and there was no substitute. Greatly distressed, the stage-manager hurried to inform the Intendant-General, who was already seated in his box, of the unheard of contretemps. The work, he admitted, ought to be familiar enough to the singers, but the very absence of the kindly souffleur might . . . . Herr von Possart at once rose to the occasion. Quitting his comfortable seat and exchanging it for the somewhat more cramped accommodation provided for the prompter, he proceeded to assume the duties of his invalid "colleague"; a proceeding in which his well-known elocutionary powers stood him in excellent stead. It is said, however, that the artists were considerably startled on seeing their all-powerful director in such an unwonted situation, and that, but for the pleasant smile on his face, there might have been some worse mishaps even than those hinted at by the worthy stage manager.

Pesaro.—Considerable success was achieved by the performance, on the 2nd ult., of an opera, "Lisette," by Signor Nini-Bellucci, a pupil of Mascagni.

Venice.—The production, on July 27, at the Fenice Theatre, of a new oratorio, "The Resurrection of Lazarus," by the Abbé Lorenzo Perosi, who conducted, created an enthusiasm almost unheard of in connection with a work of this description, the audience redemanding seven numbers and almost overwhelming the composer with their plaudits. This is the third important sacred composition, all equally successful, by Signor Perosi, who is quite a young man, and of whom, at all events, it cannot be said that he is no prophet in his own country.

Verviers.—The monument erected to Vieuxtemps in this, the great violinist's native town, is to be unveiled on the 25th inst., when a musical festival will be held in connection with the event. The interesting and attractive programme includes a grand concert at the Municipal Theatre, in which the three eminent violinists, MM. Ysaye, César Thompson, and Marsick, as well as Madame Héglon, of the Paris Opéra, will take part; also a choral concert by members of leading Belgian choirs, and the performance of a hymn composed by Vieuxtemps, with words adapted for this special occasion.

Vienna.—Amongst the novelties shortly to be brought out at the Imperial Opera are "Donna Diana," by Rezniceck (already successfully produced at Carlsruhe), and the new opera by Goldmark, "Die Kriegsgefangene," which is being most carefully rehearsed by Herr Mahler, and the performance of which is looked forward to with eager interest by the numerous admirers of the composer.

OBITUARY.

Joseph Robinson.

The veteran Joseph Robinson has not lived long to enjoy his Civil List pension, to which we referred in our last number. He passed away, full of years and honour, at Dublin, his native city, on the 23rd ult. The youngest of four musical brothers, who subsequently formed an admirable vocal quartet, Joseph Robinson was born August 16, 1816. He became a chorister of St. Patrick's Cathedral at the age of eight. When his voice broke he succeeded his brother John as organist of Sandford Church. As a lad of seventeen he was taken to Paris and heard "Robert le Diable" in the original cast. In the following year (1834) he was present at the Royal Musical Festival held at Westminster Abbey. This visit to London fired him with an enthusiasm to become a conductor, and on his return to Dublin he founded the Antient Concerts there—in fact, the Society held its first meetings in the house of the young conductor, who was then under twenty years of age. Many standard works gained early performances—and they were exceptionally beautiful performances—under Mr. Robinson's skilful conductorship. It was at the request of Mr. Robinson that Mendelssohn orchestrated his "Hear my Prayer." Meeting the composer at the band rehearsals—held at the Hanover Square Rooms—for the production of "Elijah" at Birmingham in 1846, Robinson asked Mendelssohn to score this favourite work. Mendelssohn was pleased with the suggestion, and in carrying it out it is understood that he adapted himself to Mr. Robinson's orchestra in Dublin—hence the scoring for "small orchestra." In sending the manuscript to his London publisher, Mendelssohn wrote (in English): "I send to-day an orchestra-score of my Hymn, which I hope will reconcile you to the trouble you had for my and my alterations sake." The first performance of "Hear my Prayer," in its orchestral form, took place at the Antient Concert, Dublin, December 21, 1848.

In 1837 Mr. Robinson commenced his ten years' conductorship of the University Choral Society, at which Mendelssohn's "Antigone" was performed for the first time out of Germany. In 1876, after the cessation of the Antient Concerts, Mr. Robinson founded the Dublin Musical Society, which for many years he conducted with extraordinary ability. The Society produced great choral works and was the means of "steadily educating the public to a higher tone." For twenty years (1856-76) he was one of the professors at the Irish Academy of Music, where he did excellent work. But it was as a conductor that Mr. Robinson showed his greatest strength. He revelled in choral music, and had the rare gift of being able to electrify his singers with his own fiery enthusiasm.

Mr. Robinson was a very modest man. Twice he declined the offer of being made a Doctor in Music, preferring, as he said, to remain "Joe Robinson." When he was presented with an address and a purse of 100 sovereigns by the Dublin Musical Society, the gold was returned by him with warm expressions of gratitude, and with the following characteristic words: "While I think a professional man should expect his fair remuneration, yet his chief object may be something higher and nobler—the advancement of art in his native city." The memory of the old musician, who has just entered into his rest at the age of eighty-two, will long be treasured by those who came under the influence of his genial personality and sterling musicianship.

The death occurred, on July 19, at Simferopol, in the Crimea, of Professor Yourij von Arnold, an esteemed musical author and composer. Born at St. Petersburg in 1811, of German parents, he was the intimate friend of Anton Rubinstein, whose efforts in raising the musical status in Russia he greatly aided by his theoretical and educational writings. Amongst these may be instanced his "Theory of Musical Composition," which has run through several editions, and "The Æsthetic Laws of Musical Science," which is looked upon as the standard work on the subject by Russian musicians. At one time editor of the Leipzig Allgemeine Zeitschrift für Musik and secretary to the Deutsche Musik Verein, he accepted a professorship of musical history and theory at the Moscow University in 1871, a post which he held until his death, at the advanced age of eighty-seven.

Emil Hartmann, the gifted son of the veteran composer, died at Copenhagen, on July 19, at the age of sixty-two. Emil Hartmann, the younger, was a pupil of Mendelssohn at the Leipzig Conservatorium, and some of his numerous compositions have been performed in this country, but are best known and appreciated in Germany as well as in his native country. They include several symphonies, the popular overture, "Nordische Heerfarth," and an opera, "Runenzauber," successfully produced at the Dresden Hof-Theater and elsewhere.

We have also to record the following deaths:—

On July 16, at Allentown (U.S.), WILLIAM SCHUBERT, a relative of the great composer, and himself a highly esteemed musician, aged eighty-three.

On July 20, at Mystic (U.S.), WILLIAM BREWSTER, organist, aged fifty-four.

CORRESPONDENCE.

AN APPEAL FOR HELP.

CORPUS CHRISTI COLLEGE (CAMBRIDGE) MISSION.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—The above Mission has been working some eleven years in the Old Kent Road, and, amongst other agencies, we hold every Saturday evening an Entertainment for the people, in connection with our temperance work.

One of our great difficulties has been to find performers; but through the agency of the public Press we have, during the last two years, found many friends who were willing to help us. Would you kindly through your columns invite the assistance of any of your musical readers who might be able and willing to help us, either by providing a concert for one evening or by singing or playing themselves? Our mission room will hold about 500 people and is situated in the Canterbury Road, about five minutes' walk from the Old Kent Road Station of the L.B.S.C. Railway.

Our Secretary, Mr. A. F. Penfold, 73, Canterbury Road, Old Kent Road, will be pleased to give any further particulars, and to him all communications should be addressed.—Yours truly,

W. W. HOUGH.

[We cordially commend this appeal to our readers, especially to choirmasters. Such benevolent work has been proved to be highly beneficial, not only to those who come under its elevating influences, but in no less a degree to those who take part, whether collectively as a choir or as individuals. There should be many responses to this request for practical help in so good a cause.—ED., M.T.]

BRISTOL MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—My attention having been called to a mis-statement from my pen in the July number of THE MUSICAL TIMES, and afterwards quoted in the Bristol Times and Mirror, to the effect that the Bristol Festival Choir had not been re-formed at the time of writing, I have to say that it arose through a mutual misunderstanding on the part of Mr. Riseley and myself. The Bristol Festival Choir and the Bristol contingent of the Gloucester Festival Choir were the subjects of conversation; and, from an observation Mr. Riseley made, I was led to believe that the Bristol Festival Choir had not been re-formed, whereas he must have meant that the Bristol section of the Gloucester Festival Choir had not been formed for the coming Gloucester Festival.

Naturally I exceedingly regret the unfortunate error, and trust it has had no prejudicial effect, particularly as I am anxious that the Festival should continue, and desire to do what I can to help it forward and secure its success. I may add that the guarantee fund was £400 short of the minimum at the date of this letter. I hope the required sum may be forthcoming by October 1, to which date the limit of time is extended.—Yours truly,

YOUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.

Bristol, August 19, 1898.

LEEDS MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—In view of statements frequently made, it may interest your readers to know that full rehearsals, with principals, chorus, and band, have always occupied two days at the Leeds Festivals. Up to and including 1892, these took place on the Monday and Tuesday preceding the festivals, which begin on Wednesdays. In 1895, "regardless of expense," we brought down from London the principal vocalists and the full orchestra on Friday night preceding the Festival week. A rehearsal was held on Saturday and another on Monday. Tuesday was a rest day, at least for the hard worked chorus. The advantage of this being great, the same course will be adopted for the coming Festival.

The demand for first-seat tickets has been quite unprecedented, insomuch that no second seat tickets have been issued for any concert, except Saturday night. This extended accommodation is explained by the fact that the five guinea serial ticket does not include Saturday night.—Yours truly,

FRED. R. SPARK,
Hon. Sec., Leeds Musical Festival.

Leeds, August 22, 1898.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY AND COLONIAL NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

CHIGWELL.—On Speech Day, July 28, the "Medea" of Euripides was presented to a very distinguished company by the boys of the Grammar School. Mr. Henry Riding composed incidental music for the occasion.

LOWESTOFT.—Mr. H. D. Flowers, organist of the Parish Church, took advantage of the presence in the town of Mr. Henry Such (violinist), Mr. Percy Such (violoncellist), and Mr. E. Glossop Such (vocalist) to give two excellent concerts, one in the afternoon and the other in the evening, in the Public Hall, on the 16th ult. The programmes were of a distinctly high order and their execution gave the greatest satisfaction. It is not often that Beethoven's Trios and Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto find places in the programmes of seaside concerts during the month of August; all the more gratifying, therefore, to record the fact and to commend the skilful interpretation which these classical works received on this occasion. Mr. H. D. Flowers presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. E. Glossop Such also contributed two recitations with much acceptance.

MANCHESTER.—Dr. Horton Allison's Concerto in D, for pianoforte and orchestra, was most successfully performed at the orchestral concert given by the Manchester School of Music, at the Concert Hall in the Royal Botanical Gardens, on July 23. Dr. Allison's playing of the pianoforte part of his concerto was very much applauded, and the performance of his work was ably conducted by Mr. Albert Cross and artistically led by Mr. Walter Evelyn.

RHYL.—Mr. C. Sydney Vinning, organist of St. Thomas's Church, has been giving organ recitals each Sunday evening after the service during the season. The sonatas of Mendelssohn and Guilmant were the principal works performed, and these have been interspersed with other works by Bach, Dubois, and Lemmens.

VICTORIA (BRITISH COLUMBIA).—The first concert of the Victoria Philharmonic Society took place at the Institute Hall, on July 14, with gratifying success. The band consisted of thirty-one performers, of whom seven were ladies, including one lady cornet player. The vocalists were Mrs. W. E. Green, Mrs. Janion, and Mr. Henry Moxon, and Mr. E. A. Powell played the Andante from Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto. In course of time, no doubt, this newly established orchestra will more than justify its formation, judging from the excellent account it gave of itself at the initial concert. May every success attend its efforts, including those of the able conductor, Mr. F. Victor Austin. Miss Christie and Mr. E. H. Russell were efficient accompanists.

ORGAN APPOINTMENTS.—Mr. G. Herbert Parker, Organist and Choirmaster to Barnet Congregational Church.—Mr. J. W. Bailey, Organist and Choirmaster to Walsall Road Wesleyan Chapel, Willenhall.—Mr. Arthur Sample, City Organist, York.—Mr. A. Eaglefield Hull, Organist and Choirmaster to the Parish Church, Bishop's Stortford.—Mr. Harry W. Tupper, Organist and Choirmaster to the Parish Church, Burton-on-Trent.

CHOIR APPOINTMENT.—Mr. Harold Dixon, Alto, to St. Olave's, Woodberry Down.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

PERPLEXED.—It is the old, old story. The teaching of time in music is not a matter of saying 1, 2, 3, 4; or, 1 and, 2 and, 3 and. Rhythm, rhythm, rhythm, well rubbed in, is the only cure for the defect to which you refer. Unfortunately this is often lamentably neglected in the early teaching of young children, who are instructed in time as if it were a branch of arithmetic. Try and get your pupil to feel the pulsation of the beats—their regularly recurring throb, and then explain their various sub-divisions; or, rather, get her to cut up the beats, so to speak, herself, into halves, quarters, &c. Never allow her to stop counting at the end of a bar, but always to go on to the rhythmic point—the first beat of the bar. The matter of notation should be applied after the rhythmic sub-divisions have been acquired.

HARDWING.—We fear that there are not any more comprehensive editions of Schubert's songs with English words other than those you name. In Schubert's songs words and music are so inseperable that a translation, however well done, is a poor substitute for the original German text. But there is no reason why you should not get an English translation made of any particular song or songs, if the German pronunciation is an obstacle. The best German edition is that of Dr. Max Friedländer, published by Peters, in seven volumes and a supplementary volume.

CHORISTER.—We cannot tell you how many choristers have become organists of their own cathedrals, but the following names occur to us: Dr. Maurice Greene and Sir John Stainer, St. Paul's Cathedral; Dr. Longhurst, now honorary organist of Canterbury Cathedral; the late C. W. Lavington and William Done, of Wells and Worcester Cathedrals respectively; Mr. George Riseley, the present organist of Bristol Cathedral, and Mr. A. Herbert Brewer, of Gloucester. These names should act as a stimulus to you in your worthy ambition.

LIGHT (Copenhagen).—Both the passages you quote are examples of auxiliary notes. In the Brahms extract the main harmony is the common chord of G, followed by that of C, and the F sharp is, therefore, an auxiliary note. In that by Stanford the context is a six-four chord on C, the E in this case being the auxiliary, or, what is perhaps a better term, the ornamental note of the chord.

CHOIRMASTER.—Try the tune in unison when sung to a children's hymn. You will find that it will go much brighter and more easily, especially as the harmonies are not very vocal and decidedly awkward to a voluntary choir. Many children's hymns can be much more effectively sung by being treated in this way.

MASTER B. F. B. (Melbourne).—We are much obliged for your suggestion, which shall have our careful attention. We are glad that you find that particular information useful and that you look forward to receiving THE MUSICAL TIMES month by month.

J. B.—It is quite possible that you might get a short lyric set by "a good man"; but we are unable to tell you the probable fee that he would require, or even "a rough approximation."

ENQUIRER.—Sterndale Bennett's Toccata in C minor (Op. 38) is in sonata form. The second subject in E flat (bar 11) returns in due course at bar 51, but in A flat, and not in the key of the tonic.

G. W. H.—We do not know of a book on the subject of the training of the male alto voice. The best plan would be to take some personal lessons from an expert teacher.

PIANIST.—You will find information in regard to the cost of a harp in our issue of June, p. 414. If we can further help you, please let us know.

 Notices of Concerts, of which programmes must invariably be sent, and other information supplied by our friends in the country, must be forwarded to us immediately after the occurrence; otherwise they cannot possibly be inserted.

Our correspondents will oblige by writing all names as clearly as possible, as we cannot be responsible for any mistakes that may occur.

Correspondents are informed that their names and addresses must accompany all communications.

We cannot undertake to return offered contributions; the authors, therefore, will do well to retain copies.

Notice is sent to all subscribers whose payment (in advance) is exhausted. The paper will be discontinued where the Subscription is not renewed. We again remind those who are disappointed in obtaining back numbers that, although the music is always kept in stock, only a sufficient quantity of the rest of the paper is printed to supply the current sale.

TOILERS OF THE DEEP

CANTATA

FOR FEMALE VOICES

VERSE BY JAMES STRANG

MUSIC BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

CONTENTS.

INTRODUCTION AND CHORUS—"Toiling and toss'd on the restless sea."
CRADLE SONG—"Come, my baby, come away."
CHORUS—"Oh, ho! for the winds that blow."
BALLAD—"A mermaid dwelt in days of old."
TRIO—"The twilight grey is falling."
SONG—"O manly hearts that brave the sea."
CHORUS—"Dark and darker grows the night."
CHORUS—"A prayer for those at sea."
INTERMEZZO—"Break of day."
DUET—"Through golden mists of morn."
CRADLE SONG—No. 2.
CHORUS—"Now let songs of gladness rise."

"This charming work bears all the best marks of the composer's characteristically graceful style. The libretto is of a high order of merit, and worth the music, which from first to last is attractive and without a dull page."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

"Mr. Gaul has written nothing finer, nor more melodious and captivating in this branch of composition. Taking the Cantata as a whole, it is a delightful work, replete with artistic workmanship."—Birmingham Daily Mail.

ALFRED R. GAUL'S CANTATAS.

*UNA

SIXTH AND SEVENTH THOUSAND.

PRODUCED AT THE NORWICH MUSICAL FESTIVAL, OCTOBER 4, 1893.

"'Una' is quite one of his best."—Musical Standard.

"The result, in the present case, leaves no doubt that into all the places which know his previous compositions 'Una' will find a way and become as much a favourite as its forerunners. . . . Mr. Gaul considers before all things the elegance and symmetry of his melodic phrases."—Musical Times.

"We believe that Mr. Gaul has attained greater popularity with small English provincial choral societies than any other composer living or dead."—London Daily Graphic.

†THE TEN VIRGINS

Third Edition. Ninth and Tenth Thousand.

This Edition contains the additional Soprano air "Sun of my soul."

"The work will certainly go through Saxondom in the wake of its predecessors from the same pen."—London Daily Telegraph.

"Must attain popularity wherever heard. Infinitely superior to any previous effort of the composer."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

"A distinct advance upon any of its predecessors."—Birmingham Daily Post.

"That 'The Ten Virgins' is a much finer work than the everywhere favourite 'Holy City' we have no doubt whatever."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

PRODUCED WITH THE UTMOST SUCCESS BY THE BIRMINGHAM FESTIVAL CHORAL SOCIETY.

*JOAN OF ARC

Staff Edition. Twentieth to Twenty-fifth Thousand.

"The Exeter Oratorio Society last night achieved a brilliant success, and it may safely be said, without fear of exaggeration, that never before have they performed a work more satisfactory to themselves or more interesting to the audience than 'Joan of Arc.'"—Western Times.

"One of the most delightful Concerts ever given by the South Shields Choral Society was that of last evening, when the principal piece was 'Joan of Arc.' We cannot speak too highly of Mr. Gaul's work, which is of the most interesting description, and will doubtless soon be a favourite with choral societies."—Shields Daily News.

FIFTH AND SIXTH THOUSAND.

PRODUCED AT THE CRYSTAL PALACE, JULY 9, 1892.

†ISRAEL IN THE WILDERNESS

"The work was given under Mr. Gaul's own direction by some 3,000 singers, accompanied by the Palace orchestra. Mr. Gaul has presented in no previous work better characteristics or more successful efforts than are to be found in 'Israel in the Wilderness.' The popular composer was enthusiastically cheered at the close of the performance."—Musical News.

The above Cantatas have been specially planned to meet the requirements of Musical Societies, the greater portion being choral.

Price, paper cover, 2s. 6d.; paper boards, 3s.; cloth, gilt, 4s.; Tonic Sol-fa, 1s.; Vocal Parts, each 1s. Words only, *7s. 6d.; †5s. per 100.
